New Method Helps Doctors Save Eyesight

Somewhere in Nebraska someone is going to see again because of a new, safe and simplified way to preserve corneas, instituted last week at the Eye Clinic of the University's College of Medicine in Omaha.

While fresh corneas are much better for transplantation, a preserved cornea can be extremely useful in saving eyes which otherwise would be lost waiting for fresh material, explained Mrs. Lucy Lipp, secretary and technician of the Eye Bank.

Until recently, dehydration of the cornea was prohibitively expensive for most eye clinics due to the costly equipment involved.

Now a method has been devised in which all that is needed is 95 per cent Glycerine solution, 10 grams of molecular sive, a bottle and the cornea.

This is an immeasurable boon to the eye surgeon who must meet the crucial deadlines of the operating room. He prefers fresh corneas, the transparent window of the eye, but he knows that they are scarce and available solely on a first-come, first-serve basis, she said.

Furthermore, fresh corneas can be kept for only a short time, less than 48 hours.

Dehydrated corneas can be kept for much longer periods, however. They can be flown anywhere in the world and arrive in good shape for an eye operation the following day.

Not all eye defects respond to the use of dehydrated corneas. In fact, the individual with a most serious eye condition often cannot be helped by corneal transplantation.

Therapeutically, dehydrated corneas may be used to arrest disease process. In these and many other instances, the dehydrated cornea is sufficient and further grafting of fresh tissue is not called for.

How many people this new process touches will depend greatly on the amount of donor material received at the Hascall Memorial Eye Bank, which is located at the College of Medicine Eye Clinic.
