Ag Honorary Cites Sulek For Teaching

A University agricultural engineer, John Sulek, was cited Tuesday night as recipient of the first distinguished teaching award made by Gamma Sigma Delta, honor society of agriculture.

The award was established to recognize and encourage an uncommon devotion to a common goal of developing a stronger agriculture through superior teaching.

Sulek was cited by Dean E. F. Frolik of the College of Agriculture for "outstanding devotion, untiring efforts and superb capabilities which combine to make a distinguished teacher."

"Sulek is held in high esteem by both students and faculty at this University as well as at other universities, Dean Frolik said. "His classes have been filled to capacity many times and there have been instances when more students wished to enroll than could be handled."

"Students say he knows his subject and how to put it across in an interesting understandable way. His up-to-date, fair yet demanding, and a good speaker. He stimulates in the student the desire to gain more knowledge."

"His laboratory is a working laboratory filled with tools of the trade that makes the learning process obvious and easy. His research relates to his teaching and contributes both in facts and interest to the field in which he works."

"His interest also extends beyond the student in the classroom to farmers, businessmen, and high school students who have profited from his short courses and conduct of contests and other activities," Dean Frolik said.
