

Extension Service Follows Changing Ag Technology

One of the most important aids to Nebraskans in keeping up with the rapidly changing technology of our day is the Agricultural Extension Service, a University Regent said Friday.

Regent Richard E. Adkins of Osmond addressed a session of the annual conference of the University Agricultural Extension Service at the Nebraska Center.

While praising the work of the Service and its County Agents in the past, Adkins warned that they must be prepared to change their programs, approaches, organization and audience in pace with the increasingly rapid changes in every phase of American life.

"The County Agent should be primarily an agriculturally trained man," he said, "because agriculture is the state's largest industry."

"However, there are many others on the mainstreets of our communities who need your services."

"If you can open the doors to the University and show the main streeters there are tons of information available which will help them operate efficiently, as you have done for the housewife, the rancher and the farmer, you will have met this concept."

He cited two University moves toward making possible the complete service to the people of the state that has become necessary. They are:

The tying together of the University's general extension service with the Agricultural Extension Service and the Center for Continuing Education by putting them under a single director, E. W. Janike.

The five-county area office established at Concord in conjunction with the Experiment Station.

The "tremendous interest in education" today is being proved by the emphasis being put on continuing education in the business world and by bulging college enrollments, Adkins said.

He asked the agents to examine their own programs to see if they can stand up under some of the current criticisms of the Extension Service and to improve them if they warrant criticism.

"You are being asked to extend your efforts in two directions," he said: "First, in more specialized service for agriculture and Nebraska family life. And, second, in the broader area of total educational and economic growth."

In facing up to this job, he reminded the agents, they do enough to see what is involved and to stand up and say, "no!"

The Pledge Training Creed and its enforcement the first and crucial year prove a number of vital things. They prove that some, indeed enough, mature undergraduates in the fraternity do see why the elimination of hazing is absolutely necessary for fraternity continuance. They prove that these men feel strongly enough about hazing to stand up and be counted. They prove that they are ready, willing, and able to over ride the immature but noisy minority who would unwittingly bring about our downfall. Here is fraternity operation at its most constructive level.

The earnest desire to eradicate this objectionable aspect of fraternity life has finally arisen from undergraduate members. It is the only place it can be effective. Only when pledge training creeds, or whatever chapters may care to call such of their own writing, erupt spontaneously the country over can the evil of hazing be ended. And until this comes to pass, our "house" will remain in danger.

I am not discouraged about the fraternity system. As long as things such as this Creed can happen, no one can destroy us. And so, as the newspapers repeat the appropriate warning "Keep your promise, Phi Deltas," I close this article with a heartfelt "Thanks, Phi Deltas at Illinois! You've taught me something. It must be done—can be done—and can only be done by you, the undergraduate members of our fraternities!"

Open House Feature Of Towers Dedication

An open house at the University's newest student dormitories, Pound and Cather Halls, will be held Sunday afternoon, Nov. 24.

The open house from 3 p.m. to 6 p.m. will be preceded by official dedication of the $4 million "Twin Towers" which house 960 students. Attendance at the dedication is by invitation.

The complex consists of three interconnecting buildings—a central, 2-story structure and the two dormitories 13 stories high.

not stand alone, but are "part of Nebraska's greatest educational institution."

"The job you face is not easy, but neither is it impossible. The first step again is to face up to change. And the second step is to get at it."

"If any of you are tempted to let criticism affect your determination and your enthusiasm, let me remind you that you are the most influential educational force we have at the grass roots level," Adkins said.

Rhode Island Censorship Is Defended

Kingston, R. I. (CPS) — Francis H. Horn, president of the University of Rhode Island, recently defended the censorship of Paradigm, the URI student literary publication, and refuted criticism that he is not up holding the principles of academic freedom.

Dr. Horn's statement culminated a month of controversy over the deletion of certain words and phrases from the article "Ballin" by Tom Hardie.

In defending the action of his administrative council, Dr. Horn emphasized that the Paradigm story in question was not suppressed.

In giving the reasons for the council's actions, Dr. Horn said that the board recognized that the definition of obscenity is debatable and that a final determination rests with the courts. Since no court action would be taken, the responsibility of such determination rested with the university, the state-

Dr. Horn contended that since the university collects fees which pay for the printing of Paradigm, the university could be called its publisher and "hence liable for the publication of such obscenities as would have appeared in the uncensored version."

Discussing the administration's stand on censorship in the future, Horn said that the university "will not normally resort to the censorship of student writing."

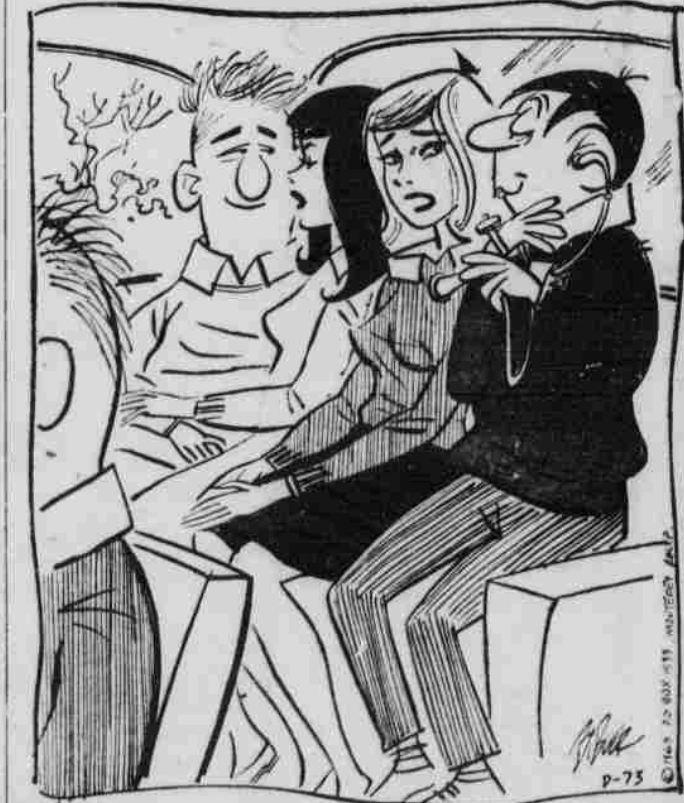

He warned that this statement does not mean there is no limit on the student's freedom of expression. "Questions of obscenity, libel, and sedition will always be relevant."
