Economic Education Progress Seen

"The Nebraska Council on Economic Education has made remarkable progress in the field of economic education during the first six months of operation," it was reported today.

Dr. E. S. Wallace, newly-appointed executive director of the Council, made this observation in summarizing the Council's activities at a meeting of the board of directors at the University of Nebraska Center.

"We have encountered intense interest and enthusiastic cooperation of the part of practically all the persons with whom we have come in contact," Wallace continued. M. L. Frankel, director of the Joint Council on Economic Education, New York City, presented the Nebraska group an official certificate of affiliation with the national Council.

In reviewing the Council's activities to date, Wallace cited the following accomplishments:

—Addition of economic education courses to secondary school educational television programs next fall by the Nebraska Council for Educational Television.

—Completion of a survey on the status of economics courses in high schools across the state.

—Development of a test of economic understanding which is being completed by over 1,000 students in 30 schools.

—Completion of economics courses for teachers at four locations in the state.

—Establishment of a three-week economic education workshop for teachers to be held this summer at the University. Thirty-five teachers from 28 school systems have been granted Council fellowships to attend the workshop. The council will continue to work with the teachers next year.

—A conference for public school administrators and Nebraska college representatives was held in April to emphasize the importance of economic education.

William Gillies, Council field director, reported that the first in-service training programs for high school teachers were held at Hastings and Lincoln during the past six months. Extension courses in economics for teachers were held at Alliance and Ogallala.

Unionizing—Art Sale Will Solve Problems

By BILL HARDING

For all those who did not return the pictures that they borrowed from the Art Lending Library, and for all those good souls that did return pictures last Thursday and Friday and now don't have anything to cover that hole in the wall, it's coming! Your chance will be here May 21 and 22, this Thursday and Friday.

The Student Art Sale will be found in the Pan American Room of the Union. If certain segments of your walls, floors or ceilings need covering, come on in and look around, you will be sure to find something that will do.

However, if this is not your reason, and you really do appreciate some of the fine things in life, you will surely appreciate the works of the twenty-six contributing artists. There will be oils, water color, pencil, and charcoal drawings; pen sketches, pottery and sculptures. Even if you don't plan on buying anything, stop in and see the works of the talent that we have on campus.

The University Choral Union will be held Sunday at 8 p.m. in the Coliseum, and for some creative inspiration before finals . . . one couldn't ask for more. And besides, if you don't get any inspiration, you can sit in your final and sing to yourself; so plan to be there Sunday.

predicted spectacular breakthroughs in the biological and chemical control of plant and animal diseases in the next ten years.

He was explaining the probable future of farming to a meeting here of the South-west Iowa Bankers Association.

In his youth on a farm in Saline County, he said, a man with three 80s of farmland needed either a couple of sons or a hired hand to get his work done.

"Today the typical farmer operates about a half section or more, and there is a corresponding decrease in the number of families on farms," he pointed out.

"Changes in agriculture will continue," he said. "There will be an increasing need for capital, more growth in the size of individual units and specialization of these units in one or a few enterprises, and increased use of technical materials and procedures."

He said this was not a prediction that small, marginal units will be eliminated. People live on farms for different reasons, he explained, and the marginal farms, though fewer, will be part of the agricultural scene in the foreseeable future.

As to technological changes, he predicted that research is nearly certain to bring about several.

"We will continue to develop crop varieties with higher yield potentials, as well as types that meet specific demands by processors.

"We will continue to expand the use of fertilizers, making greater use of soil tests.

"Our pest control techniques must continue to improve. We have made much progress in the control of weeds, insects, and plant and animal diseases, but there is a great deal of room for further advances.

"I anticipate that during the next ten years there will be spectacular breakthroughs in the biological and chemical control of plant and animal diseases.

"Perhaps more important, we must recognize that our research efforts cannot be confined to the more obvious and traditional areas. Research and education are being called on for more imagination than ever before.

"Actually, some of the questions facing us today were not even being asked as recently as five years ago. Since we can't predict all future problems, our storehouse of knowledge must contain the basic information on which we can base answers to problems as they occur."

The long-term picture for agriculture is bright Frolik said, but this bright future will require the combined efforts of all segments of industry—farmers and ranchers, scientists and educators, businessmen and bankers.
