Art Opportunities Varied

Editor's Note: This is another in a series of articles concerning opportunities for non-majors. This story concerns opportunities in the Department of Art.

By Priscilla Mullins
Senior Staff Writer

For the potential Rembrandt who likes art just as a hobby, the University Art Department offers many courses to the student.

The choice of courses available to the non-art major is quite varied according to Professor Duard Laging, chairman of the department.

Any of the beginning courses, including drawing logic, design and pottery, are open to the general student, Laging said.

"Any art course without a prerequisite may be taken," he said. There are also courses in art history which are available to a budding artist who plans to make a living in some other field.

There are a number of extension courses open to students, including jewelry making and painting. Laging said that any of these extension courses may be taken by the student at large.

As a segment of the Arts and Sciences College, the Art Department provides services to its own college, according to Laging, but it also assists other colleges. He said that drawing is taught to architecture students, and art education is taught to elementary education majors in Teachers College.

The summer session offers such courses as Latin American art history, sculpturing, painting, and an all-state course for high school students.

According to Laging, the University Art Department is one of the better departments in the Midwest. He attributed this to the "fine faculty," as well as "one of the better American art collections" in Sheldon Art Gallery.

He said that the faculty in the department have all exhibited work nationally, and some of them internationally.

The offering of courses is "as broad as any mid-west college," according to Laging. He pointed out that a graduate degree program is also offered in the department.

"The opportunities for the artistically talented, and the not-so-talented in the department are many and varied," according to Laging, "but for the student seeking a rounding out of his cultural education, the art department stands ready to accept any student registered at the University."
