For about two seconds before Saturday night's crowd completely smothered the floor in pure joy, five Michigan representatives stood in shock as if they had just been told they had to walk back to Ann Arbor in their uniforms.

Then complete anarchy took over and the Michigan team was seen no more.

Such was the atmosphere as Husker fans whooped it up after seeing a team that had been humiliated by a Wyoming five in their opening game, and then just barely having pulled one out against a bland South Dakota team Monday night, pull the biggest upset of the still green season.

Comments after the game ran from Fred Hare's explicative, "I had to get the ball into the basket," to losing Coach Dave Strack's, "It's a funny game."

It would have been funny if the Wolverine's chartered plane had remained fog-bound at the Detroit airport Friday night, too.

Looking over the statistics of the game one finds that all five of the Husker starters were in double figures. This game-winning balance is found in two other games: the upset of Purdue, and the triumph over South Dakota.

In two of these games Nebraska offset a fine performance by the opponents' big guns, Schelhaus of Purdue, and Cazzie Russell, Michigan. (Russell's performance was so smooth, except for that last free throw, that one found it hard to remember all the points he did make.)

There were several noticeable changes in the Huskers' play that deserve mention. The extensive use of the fast break was just a little too much for Michigan to cover with its three big men Darden, Buntin, and Tregging still under the board as more than half the Nebraska team was speeding down the court.

Of course, this fast break wouldn't have been possible without the aggressive rebounding policies of Antulov, Hare and Webb. Outweighed and overreached by the bigger Wolverines, time and again the Huskers came up with the ball before it could be jammed down through the hoop on that second and third rebound attempt.

The use of Hare at forward during the last part of the game by Coach Cipriano is to be commended. Hare was hitting so let him shoot.

The big problem facing the Huskers now is rather ironical although very common in the world of college athletics. After beating a team that was No. 1 can our Cloud 9-riders show some of the same class when they begin the long grind of Big Eight competition.

Grubbies 'Out' For Downtown

To wear them or not to wear them — grubbies, that is. Theater, shopping, class? Hardly.

Grubbies are "in" inside — that is, inside dorms, houses, or whenever the wearer is with a group of friends.

Grubbies are "out" for downtown, around campus buildings, or in public places where students will be meeting people they don't know.

Standard grubby wear consists of cut-off jeans, an old, faded sweatshirt at least six sizes too big, and tennis shoes, preferably with holes in them.

A well-dressed grubby wearer avoids wearing a printed blouse hanging out from underneath her sweatshirt. A white collar adds a well-groomed note.

Other "d'its" for grubby wearers are to avoid wearing baggy sweatshirts, too tight jeans, or jeans with fringe around the bottom.

Acceptable places for grubbies to be found may be building homecoming displays, painting sets for a play, or decorating for a dance.

Formal Dressing Requires Practice

A universal rule of thumb for tuxedo wearers: have the tucks in your cummerbund turning down so they won't catch crumbs.

Judging from the paucity of tuxedos worn to formal affairs on campus today, it would seem that University students only have a passing acquaintance with this type of formal wear.

According to Mike Barton, sales representative from Captain's Walk, it is unfortunate that students don't have more formal affairs to attend.

"College is the training ground for future behavior; we will be called upon to entertain in the business world and we should have had practice in college," Barton said.

It is interesting to review some features of the "relic" for the wearing of a tuxedo which involves many intricacies.

The classic winter tux is black with a black satin shawl collar, two or three buttons and natural shoulders.

Tuxedo trousers have no cuff, and many have a black stain strip down the sides. They should be an inch bigger than ordinary pants, and are held by suspenders.

The suspenders have an advantage over a belt; they do not wrinkle the formal shirt and they give the pants a better hang.

The purpose of the cummerbund around the waist is to hide the suspender ends. The cummerbund should match the tie. Although black is the traditional color, plaids and stripes are new innovations.

The tuxedo vest is making a recovery, and is replacing the cummerbund.

The tie may be either the standard bow or the continental type. (Wearing a clip-on tie is the easy way out, but is also easily detected.)

The old stiff white bib has been replaced by a formal white shirt. Many tux shirts today have either pleats or laces.

The pleats should be lifted up and not left stuck flat together. There is less chance

Plaids, Stripes Good For Men

Plaids and stripes are now a highly acceptable part of a man's wardrobe according to Don Stewart, clothing buyer for Ben Simon's.

"Plaids in sport coats are good," said Stewart, "but they must be chosen with taste and discretion. Red and striped ties are in extremely fine taste, too," he said.

When wearing a patterned coat a man should wear plain trousers, Stewart said. "With a plain coat, checkered slacks can be worn, but plain slacks are usually better," he said.

Herringbones and blazers are now the leading coat style with the college man, Stewart said. Olives, navies, clays and putties were named as the suit color now popular, in addition to the traditional black. Pin-stripe shirts should be worn with a plain colored coat Stewart said. He named the button down collar and the snap tab as "essential" ingredients in the wardrobe of the well-dressed college man.

The type of clothing which is worn should depend on the occasion the person is going to. "The student should check ahead of time to see what type of dress will be in good taste," Stewart said.

"The retail clothing business buys and sells what the college man wants," Stewart said. "We may try to introduce some styles," he said, "but we are ultimately guided by his likes and dislikes."
