Fashion Students Learning Of Paris

University students majoring in textiles, clothing and design are getting a big surprise this semester.

They're receiving firsthand information about Paris fashion from a new instructor who has studied in Paris and designed for private showings in the San Francisco area. And this knowledge is being imparted by a man—the first to serve as an instructor in this department of the School of Home Economics.

The newcomer is Robert Hillestad. Hillestad hopes to contribute all he can to the Department of Textiles, Clothing and Design and his background promises he'll be doing just that.

In addition to studying in Paris and preparing semi-annual fashion previews, he served as manager of the gift section and assistant buyer at Marshall Field and Co. in Chicago.

A graduate from the University of Wisconsin, Hillestad commented that he first became interested in fashion when he received a degree in art and saw specialized areas in the fashion industry. He also has attended the Art Institute at Chicago and received executive training in department store management at Northwestern University.

When asked why he decided to teach, Hillestad replied, "A lot can be done in the area of fashion and design—we must prepare students so they know what to expect." He hopes to encourage more textile, clothing and design majors and tell them what the area has to offer, and he added, "the fashion industry needs them."

Hillestad is teaching an introductory class in design and draping. His flair for good design is reflected by creative displays in his classroom.
