

Challenges Developing In Social Work Field

New and challenging opportunities in the social work field are developing in the public service for college men and women, states Dr. Ellen Winston, Commissioner of Welfare of the U.S. Department of Health, Education, and Welfare, Washington, D.C.

There is new emphasis on welfare services in the public assistance program for prevention of dependency and for rehabilitation and there are related activities in the "War on Poverty" under the Economic Opportunity Act. These developments have increased the need for persons with a bachelor's degree, for entering case work positions in State and local welfare agencies.

Most State civil service or merit systems are currently scheduling spring examinations which college seniors are eligible to take. Many public welfare agencies also offer summer employment opportunities to undergraduates, particularly between the junior and senior years.

All State and many local welfare agencies have educational leave plans to assist promising employees to secure graduate training and there are many scholarships available in schools of social work.

Persons who receive a master's degree from a school of social work will have excellent opportunities for advancement because of the shortages in this profession.

Personal qualities essential for success in any type of social work are emotional maturity and a basic interest in helping people solve their personal and social problems.

The majority of social workers in public agencies provide social services to individuals, families, or groups. However, a large number of positions call for administrative, consultative and supervisory abilities.

The many types of social work include working with families having dependent children, with aged persons, with persons who are physically or mentally ill, with persons who are physically disabled, and with children who need homes or who are in foster or adoptive homes, or who are delinquent or in danger of becoming delinquent.

Social research is another related field of work, calling for graduate training in the behavioral sciences and in research and statistics. For persons with a feeling for people, and who are interested in helping them, social work is a challenging and rewarding profession.

President Johnson has said: Social workers are the front line troops in our war on poverty. They treat the social ills of society as the physician treats its physical ills. Our nation needs their valuable help today, and this need will grow as our society undergoes the changes that inevitably accompany progress.

Positions in State and local welfare agencies are filled by competitive examinations administered by the State civil service or merit system. Examinations in the States are held one or more times during the year, with a spring examination designed to give an opportunity for seniors to qualify for a job and establish their eligibility by graduation.

Information and State application forms can usually be secured through the college placement office. In any event they can be obtained from the State civil service or merit system agency.

Details about opportunities, scholarships and requirements for admission to graduate schools of social work may be obtained from the National Commissions for Social Work Careers, 345 East 46th Street, New York, New York 10017, or from the Welfare Administration, U.S. Department of Health, Education and Welfare, Washington, D.C.

To extend the service to students who may find it difficult to attend any of the regular counseling sessions, a phone service has been established in the Nebraska Union (ext. 2487).
