

Special Session

disputed the figures and conclusions reached in the report and maintained that the correct projected enrollment figures were not completed until after the budget had been submitted to the Legislature.

Samuelson noted that his committee had compiled its information in eight days and had "assimilated a great many facts" that they had no previous knowledge about.

"But any misstatements, mis-facts or misquotes does not change the situation," he added. His sources, he continued, were diversified and had no knowledge that other people were being contacted "and yet the information they gave us agreed."

Hardin noted that the factors resulting in the differences between the number of students accommodated for and the number that actually enrolled in the University were as follows:

—The number of high school graduates that went on to college was greater than anticipated.

—And that the retention rate of University students was greater than had been in the past. For instance, 78 per cent of the freshman enrolled as sophomores last year as compared to 62 per cent the previous year.

He said that the Administration and Board of Regents had discussed possibilities of asking for a special session of the Legislature to appropriate more money but that "it does not look too encouraging."

Hardin added that one reason for the reluctance to call a special session was because this year is an election year. For that reason the only plausible solution to the University's problem, he continued, would seem to be to temporarily raise the tuition.

He added that a third solution might be to have the University over-spend its present allocation and have the Legislature appropriate more money to cover the deficit, but that too is inadvisable.

"According to the advice of our legal counsel," he said, "there is no way of getting permission to do this. Even if the Budget Committee said to go ahead, the members might not be back and they wouldn't be bound by what they said."

Hardin admitted that although the increase is designed to be temporary, the Legislature might allocate funds in 1967 in such a manner to make the change permanent.

When asked what the students desired, Hardin answered that a committee could be sent to the governor requesting that a special session be called and added that he was unprepared to say whether such a committee would have the public backing of the University until he spoke with the Board of Regents.

He added that he would present a request to the Regents for the Student Senate requesting their support if the Student Senate so desired. "I won't say what you should or should not do," he added, "that is up to you to decide."

Campus Buildings Recall Former NU Chancellors, Faculty Members

By Julie Morris
Senior Staff Writer

Campus buildings—be they towering monuments of concrete and glass or classic Greek with massive columns—tell the story of the University in an enduring way.

While students race through the school in three to eight years and faculties change constantly, the buildings always remain waiting for new faces.

Some of the faculty and administrators have left their names to the campus buildings.

Bessey Hall, housing biological, physiological and zoological sciences, was named after Charles Bessey, professor of botany and one-time chancellor.

When Bessey worked as a botanist, the University was considered a "botanist's Mecca," according to Dr. Robert Manley, associate professor of history. Manley is presently working on a history of the University to be published during the Nebraska centennial year.

Bessey was the nation's "leading botanist for 20 years," Manley observed. While Bessey served as chancellor, Manley said, he had "no smoking" signs placed all over the campus and forbade smoking anywhere on the grounds. He was, Manley explained, somewhat opposed to smoking tobacco.

Andrews Another building named after a former chancellor is Andrews Hall. Elisha Andrews was chancellor in the early 1900's.

When Andrews Hall was first built, the building was known as "tongue and tooth hall" because it housed the language department and the dentistry college, according to one alumna.

Manley characterized An-drewhs as "one of our outstanding chancellors, the University reached its early academic peak under his leadership."

Avery Laboratory of Chemistry takes its name from yet another chancellor, Samuel Avery.

Avery was an expert in animal husbandry, Manley said. His motto was "culture and agriculture." Perhaps living up to this, Avery was "one of those most responsible for the development of western Nebraska," Manley noted.

Architectural Hall started its life in 1896 as Library Hall. It housed the library, the State Historical Society's material, the art gallery and five academic departments. The University Library was the first library built west of the Mississippi, Manley said.

Student Union The Temple building was originally intended as a student union. The early students, Manley explained, lived off campus and had little opportunity for social functions as a group. Attempting to remedy this situation, it was suggested that a place specifically for social gatherings be built, so Andrews, then chancellor, set about raising money.

Andrews, Manley related, managed to get John D. Rockefeller, the oil magnate, to contribute two-thirds of the money needed for construction.

The rest of the money, he proposed would come from the Legislature. But the senators balked, maintaining that it would not be right to take money from a man who made it by "oppressing the lower classes of society."

A hot debate issued over the acceptance of the money. Finally the Legislature turned the idea down, but private contributions raised the total needed and the building was erected.

ARCHITECTURAL HALL . . . was originally built as a library the first west of the Mississippi River.

Study Group Participates In Sex Knowledge Exam

A study group at the Wesley Foundation has been dealing with a Sex Knowledge Inventory exam as part of the study program.

The exam was described by the program director, the Rev. Duane Hutchinson, as a "very frank" test used to determine the amount of knowledge an individual has concerning sex in marriage. It is usually reserved for use in premarital counseling.

The study program is a six-week course geared to the examination of love, the nature of Christian compassion, the meaning of sexual responsibility and the means for a mature relationship between marriage partners. Background material being used for the course is Erich Fromm's "The Art of Loving."

The students participating in the program are not preparing for marriage. About 25 took the Sex Knowledge Inventory test last week. Discussion of the test and student responses followed at Wednesday's session.

Subjects covered in the test and discussion ranged from birth control to venereal disease to the correct attitudes toward sex.

One of the greatest problems married couples face, Hutchinson told the students, is a "misunderstanding of the sex role played by the man and by the woman. Men have a hard time understanding," he said, "that it is the whole experience of childbearing and rearing to which the woman is oriented."

Wednesday the group also discussed part of "The Art of Loving," attempting to discover "what we think Fromm thinks" as Hutchinson put it. The students discussed Fromm's hypothesis that man's basic problem is his separateness and alienation and his need to overcome this situation or go insane. Fromm's concept of the orgasmic state also came under the group's scrutiny. An orgasmic state, Fromm holds, is a ritual during which a transitory state of exaltation is brought on and the world outside of the participating individuals disappears for the individuals. With the disappearance of the outside world comes the disappearance of the feeling of aloneness and separateness.

"It seems that after the orgasmic experience," Fromm says, "man can go on for a time without suffering too much from his separateness." Hutchinson suggested that church worship services "are in some sense orgasmic experiences."

He told the students to notice how people often tend to want to stop and chat with one another after church services rather than before and suggested this occurs because of the orgasmic nature of the church service which breaks down the separateness of the worshippers.

AUF To Open Faculty Drive

The All-University Fund (AUF) faculty drive will begin Monday and will run through April 9, according to JoAnn Christensen, chairman of the faculty drive. AUF has set the goal at $1,200, which will go to World University Service. Miss Christensen said the theme of the drive is a quote from James Russell Lowell: "Not what we give, but what we share."

Films Discussion

A discussion of the foreign films, "Marcello" (Mexico) and "The Organizer" (Italian), will be held March 15 in the Nebraska Union small auditorium at 7:00 p.m. The forum, sponsored by the Union Film Society, will be moderated by R. A. Bowers.
