Intramural-Space Problem

By Rich Thompson

Our campus is hampered by a severe lack of facilities for recreational activity and it will be necessary for much expansion to take place before classes resume next fall.

Of this University's 15,000 students 90% participate in intramural athletics or use the University recreational areas. These figures, which were obtained from Joel Meier, University Director of Intramurals, do not include physical education classes.

Area Overused

With the booming growth of education classes and intramural athletics are vying for the same areas. The more students, the more intramural teams that must be played off each season in the same amount of time on the same area.

This problem caused discontinuation of intramural football playoffs last fall! In addition, more students mean more physical education classes, which compounds this problem even further.

There are four fields on City Campus and three on East Campus used for physical education and intramurals. occupy these areas until 4:30 or 5:30 p.m. Monday through Friday.

Erection of a new Women's Physical Education Building will cut the existing space to one-half and Physical education classes will completely occupy the time squeezing out intramurals and open recreation completely. The case of the University swimming pool serves to demonstrate the acuteness of our problem. Men's and Women's physical education classes crowd its schedule along with use by the varsity and freshman swim teams. This single pool must, in addition, provide recreation swimming for 15,000 students in that little time left unscheduled.

Other indoor facilities possess similarly crowded schedules. Many are almost completely booked for classes during the week.

Women's P.E. Field

The women's physical education field, over one-half of the University field space, is a temporary field—so called by the University architects because it was originally designated as a building site, not a physical education field as it is now used.

The field has three inches of top soil under which is a layer of sand, in preparation for building. Such a field is unsuitable for athletic activity as it can easily be torn up, so the field is not open for free recreation.

With 90% of the students desiring to use these facilities it is necessary that the University provide adequate intramural and recreational areas. The great increase in student enrollment brings the obvious need of more field space. Dr. Miller, Director of Men's Physical Education, Dean Breckenridge, Vice Chancellor and Dean of Faculties, and Joel Meier, Director of Intramurals, have expressed their concern that University recreational areas need expanding.

Solution

There are many possible

The new women's P.E. Building will take up this space in the future.

steps that could be taken toward solution of the space problem. Lights could be erected on physical education fields. This plan, to increase the amount of time the present space could be used and not the amount of space, would bring about a large increase in the number of intramural games that could be played each day.

Use of property presently owned by the University, such as some of the unused portions of the Agricultural College campus is another possibility. Use of area within the Nebraska State Fair Grounds is a possibility. This plan would present little difficulty because the Fair Grounds are unused during the school year. The last solution would be the inevitable purchase of more lands. This step is unavoidable, but adoption of some or all of the above proposals could keep these purchases at a minimum.

Bufs Hope For Upset

Led by all-around entries Captain Bill Padia and Bob Fisher, Colorado's gymnastics team will try to dethrone Iowa State's defending Big Eight champions at the conference meet in Lawrence this weekend.

Coach Glenn Wilson's Buffaloes have an outside chance to upset the Cyclones. But it would require superb overall performances from all the Bufs to make such an upset possible. More realistically, the Bufs may have to battle furiously for second place against a home-standing Kansas team.
