

Conduct Debate

city' which means a voice in the formulating of rules within the classroom.

"Article I means that students should govern themselves as to all aspects of student life outside the classroom," she said.

"Students at the University don't govern themselves," she declared. "To call ASUN a government is to be hypocritical. You can't have a thing to govern."

Ross stated that student government should be involved in formulating rules for student conduct. If a change is needed, they should participate, along with the others involved, in deciding upon any alterations.

"The statement of policy in the Campus Handbook is not administration word only, but state laws, rulings of the Faculty Senate and Board of Regents are also involved," Dean Ross explained.

"If something resembling a student bill of rights would be passed by the students at the University, the proposal would have to be reviewed by the Faculty Senate Committee on Student Affairs (composed of both faculty and students.)"

"It might stop there, maybe it would go on to the faculty senate, maybe here to administration, maybe to the Board of Regents," Ross continued.

"Wherever it would go, those bodies which participated in establishing the rules will participate in reviewing any changes in these rules."

According to Miss Aitkin, if ASUN rejects the proposal for a bill of rights, CFDP will take the problem to the students for a referendum. If ASUN approves, an ad hoc committee (or whatever the senate specifies) should be decided upon for the drawing up of a bill of rights.

"Another alternative is that the senate will reject a bill of rights and so will the students. In that case the name of ASUN should be changed to Student Advisory Board to the Administration," Miss Aitkin stated.

Schaaf stated that he felt it was necessary to determine if the students believe they are lacking some freedom, and whether or not it is a given right or a privilege to be earned. He particularly stressed the making of this distinction.

"If a bill of rights was passed by the students of the University, it might be a clarification and a guarantee, for example, declaring the students' right to free speech," Schaaf stated.

"Simply saying we have the rights doesn't necessarily grant them to us. We can't say we have a privilege when we haven't earned it," he continued.

"I believe it is a mistake to push for a change."

"I believe that we should work with administration on any changes found necessary in the area of student conduct."

"We may have to prove that we deserve them," Schaaf concluded.

Pittenger Says Only Tickets Unsold Are For Opening Game With TCU

All Nebraska football games except the opener against Texas Christian University are completely sold out, according to Ticket Manager Jim Pittenger.

Slightly more than 50,000 season tickets have been sold. The seating capacity of the stadium is about 62,500.

Pittenger says he is confident that there will be an adequate supply of tickets for students assuming that the percentage of students buying tickets is normal.

He estimates that about 16,500 students will purchase tickets this year.

Upper class seats are determined on the basis of a lottery.

In the spring students buy their tickets and draw a number. When sales are completed, the tickets are arranged in numerical order. Students who have drawn the lower numbers get the better seats.

Students may pick up their tickets from September 12-16 at the Coliseum.

Freshmen begin buying their tickets September 12. All their seats are in one of the end zones so there is no lottery.

Faculty who wish to buy tickets order them in May. Their seats are assigned according to their academic rank.

Block groups, such as fraternities, sororities and dorms, draw their tickets in a lottery. A representative of a group draws a number. Just as with individual seats, lower numbers get better seats.

There is no distinction made between Greek and independent groups. As far as the ticket office is concerned, the number is all that counts.

Nebraska currently has about 30,000 season ticket holders.

Those who wish to purchase season tickets order them from the ticket office. At the end of the season, ticket holders may renew their orders.

Pittenger says the number of season ticket holders is being restricted so there will continue to be adequate student seating as enrollment expands.

Advance planning is necessary for the ticket office to handle such special events as Band Day. The 3,600 seats

Seminar To Introduce AWS Rules, Programs

A general outline of AWS programs for the year was presented by individual committee chairmen at the first AWS Board meeting Tuesday.

A seminar for Lincoln students will be held September 21, according to Susie Sitorius, AWS workers chairman.

"The purpose of this seminar is to acquaint Lincoln students with the AWS program, new AWS rules and to orientate them with the location of University dormitories and general aspects of campus operation," Miss Sitorius added.

A coed counseling program has been devised this year according to Elaine Kallos, freshman orientation chairman. Girls representing Lincoln, the dormitories and sororities have been selected to emphasize the AWS program area to freshmen women.

"Each coed counselor will adopt one floor of girls. They will meet with the freshmen next week to explain why AWS has the policies it does and how AWS functions in general," Miss Kallos continued.

Coed counselors will speak also with freshmen coeds before important AWS events such as the activities mart and Coed Follies so they may take a more active part in both campus and AWS functions stated Miss Kallos.

Marti Hughes announced the upperclass activities mart will be held September 21. Any activity desiring a booth in the mart is to contact Miss Hughes by next Monday.
