CLOSED CIRCUIT TELEVISION... gives patients a chance to keep up with some classes.

Student Health Offers ITV Class

Hospitalization at Student Health is no longer a reason for not attending some classes, thanks to University Television.

At least there is no excuse for students enrolled in classes taught via closed circuit television.

Installing TV sets in the student hospital is one of the several new applications for closed circuit television now under way or under study at the University, according to Dr. M. Scheffel Pierce, faculty coordinator for instructional TV (ITV).

East Campus and with Clare McPhee Public School and Lincoln's new East High School.

A class will be added for the spring semester entitled Electrical Circuits. The course was taped at Purdue University and taught by William H. Hayt, Jr., chairman of Purdue's School of Electrical Engineering.

Pierce said he has had requests for closed circuit TV applications in music, biology, zoology, philosophy of education, and inquiries in engineering, health and physical education.

Other closed circuit University Television shows have been on orientation for parents of new students, orientation for student teachers and a show depicting spatial relationships for the College of Architecture.

The proposed budget anticipates no increases in student tuition or fees in the two-year period. The budget rests heavily on the amount of tax dollars the legislature will allow the University.

'NU Suicide Rate Is Not Serious'

Suicidal tendencies at the University are not great, according to Dr. William Brill, Student Health Center psychiatrist.

"During the academic year, an average of six to twelve students will attempt to kill themselves and one student succeeds in committing suicide," Dr. Brill said.

Suicide methods and degree of illness differ from individual to individual, but the most frequent methods are taking an overdose of drugs and nicking the wrists.

"The number of attempts is not high in terms of readily identifiable suicides, and they do not all cross our desk," he stated.

Dr. Brill said that he feels some auto accidents are suicidal. However there is no way of knowing if they are intentional and planned or accidental; they are entered in the statistics as accidents.

The number of students who seriously contemplate suicide is relatively small, Dr. Brill continued. In most cases, it is a quick mulling over and flash thought which entered their mind and was instantaneously rejected.

Many people have only a fleeting thought for suicide and it cannot be considered contemplation. But a fleeting thought could take root and lead to an elaborate contemplation, he said.

Even though there are more boys in the University, on a strict percentage basis, suicidal attempts are more prevalent in girls, Dr. Brill noted. Boys can turn their aggressiveness outward more than girls can, he said.

Most likely to try to commit suicide are the impulsive person who is overwhelmed easily, the person given to depression and feels bad or "blue," and the very isolated person who has no way to turn and has cut off his roots from other people.

"Some attempts seem to be a cry for help," Dr. Brill said, "a gesture to convey their distress to people in the environment."

Each case is evaluated as to whether the person might attempt suicide again. Most students who have tried and failed continue in school unless they are extremely ill, he stated.

"We usually go into their life history and life circumstances and try to make some alteration plan with them to recognize themselves—to get well, so to speak."

This sometimes entails getting out of school or realigning with their parents, Dr. Brill said.

Two factors are important in evaluating a person—his basic personality and life situation at that given moment, he stated.
