

NFU Proves Successful; Instructors 'Pleased'

By Mark Gordon
Junior Staff Writer

Although class attendance dwindled from initial stages, the Nebraska Free University instructors were generally pleased with the progress of their courses.

With the majority of the first NFU classes completed, most teachers felt the NFU made strides toward achieving their goals, although some were disappointed with several aspects of the program.

Terry Tilford, a University graduate student, who taught classes entitled "The Psychedelic Drugs," and "A Survey of Buddhism," felt that the NFU was "a good idea, and since I was generally pleased with the response, I would consider teaching it again next fall."

Although both classes ended last week, they began with approximately 20 registrants and eventually diminished to about 4 students. He added that there was a great attendance variance from class to class.

"I personally wasn't interested in a large class as I knew it would percolate down to an interested group," he added, "In my Buddhism class, I just had lectures but there was much discussion at the drug class."

Alvin Petersen, Lutheran Student Foundation Pastor, who taught a class called "Dietrich Bonhoeffer," said that his class possessed a positive attitude in the five sessions that it met.

The average attendance at the sessions were between seven and eight persons, he added.

C. R. Gruner, associate professor of Speech and Dramatic Arts, was generally disappointed in his classes and the lack of attendance.

He said that he cancelled his two classes after the third session when no students attended, although the initial response showed 35 students registered for his "Psychology of Humor" and 15 signed up for his "Cultural Impact of the Mass Media."

"I sort of expected it as there wasn't great enthusiasms except for a minority of individuals," he said, "I think it was sort of a flash in the pan idea."

"I was delighted at the beginning but there didn't seem to be great enthusiasm to jump in and discuss the matters," he added.

Dana Deeds, who taught the "Dynamics of the Underdeveloped World" class said he was pleased with the course although if it is taught again he would arrange it differently.

The class originally began with 15 students but the average attendance ran between nine and ten during the last few sessions.

"I didn't feel I was qualified to teach the class, entirely, so I organized a system of bringing in other graduate students in political science, economics and history to talk to the class," he explained.

"I was pleased with the class as the people who came were interested in the subject," he added, "I learned a lot from the class, and, also, learned about how to organize it differently if I teach it in the fall."

He added that the students were somewhat mixed in their reactions to the class but the spirit was there and "then again, it is still in the experimental stage."

Ivan Volgyes, assistant professor of political science, who instructed "Theories of Communism," indicated the class is still meeting with an average attendance of 20 students.

He said he had mixed feelings on the course although he said the students "were interested in the class and seemed to want to pursue it further."

He added that several students "were heard to draw out of their shells," and thought the class needed more student participation although "it is going along pretty well right now."

Stephen Hilliard, assistant professor of English, who taught a class called "The Intellectual Commitment in the University," until the class was discontinued before spring vacation, said his average attendance usually approached six to eight students.

"It really didn't develop too much, but the people had fun and learned also," he said, "and one of the NFU's purposes is bringing people together to discuss matters."

"We did not have a class structure so there was no real progression from week to week, but there was a useful exchange of ideas and I was generally satisfied with the class."

HE DONE HER WRONG . . . or Wedded But No Wife, and the Great Western Melodrama offer the chance to throw popcorn at villains, cheer the heroines and generally spur the performers to dramatic heights. The Old Crusty Minstrels show will be Friday and Saturday night in the Nebraska Union.
