"Semester of Discontent" played at Abel this fall. It wasn't acted, it was shown: students filed into the lounge, lights dimmed, and the projector ran.

The film was an analysis of student riots, Student Action.

It wasn't filmed at Nebraska — it was filmed at other universities throughout the nation.

Student Action at the University this semester has not taken the form of student riots but rather has followed the course of resolutions presented to the Regents "for consideration."

However, there were some signs of life this semester: a few people did say "no" to administration, a few people did say "no" to the Vietnam War, a few people did say "yes" to academic freedom, and many people said "I don't give a damn"—and they didn't.

However, strides were made in student awareness: long-haired "radicals" were joined by "straights" in an anti-napalm demonstration last November; University students and faculty formed a local chapter of Concerned Democrats bent on peace in Vietnam; and several faculty members and students took a public stand opposing the right wing factions of the University and state.

And many people still said "I don't give a damn" and they didn't.

Gunners still seem to be more interested in Union that in Senate and most freshmen still don't know who Dean G. Robert Ross is and most students still aren't aware that there is something out there beyond the University, but 900 people did vote in the Vietnam referendum and IDA did say "no" and a Centennial College is going to be a reality next year.
