Omaha, 1968—

the watched pot begins to boil

Omaha is plain, broad-shouldered, traditional. In many ways it lags carefully behind the avant-garde ways of the cities on either coast. But like every large city in America, Omaha is on the verge of a race that will change the course of the city, and the lives of its citizens, in the years to come.

While the Negroes in Omaha are not suffering brutalities and violence, they are being forced to live in ghettos. In some instances, the Negroes find it necessary to live in housing conditions that are subhuman. They are forced to live in overcrowded slums, where they are subjected to a continual threat of violence and the possibility of a flare up of a race war. The situation in Omaha is completely separate from the situation in the South. However, the Negroes here are being forced to live in ghettos.

The grievances at the center of the situation are not necessarily the same as the grievances that are causing the trouble in the South. However, the situation is completely separate from the situation in the South. However, the situation is completely separate from the situation in the South. However, the situation is completely separate from the situation in the South.

The situation in Omaha is completely separate from the situation in the South. However, the situation is completely separate from the situation in the South. However, the situation is completely separate from the situation in the South.

Many Negroes in Omaha feel that they are being forced to live in ghettos. In some cases, they feel that they are being forced to live in housing conditions that are subhuman. They are forced to live in overcrowded slums, where they are subjected to a continual threat of violence and the possibility of a flare up of a race war. The situation in Omaha is completely separate from the situation in the South. However, the situation is completely separate from the situation in the South. However, the situation is completely separate from the situation in the South.

The grievances at the center of the situation are not necessarily the same as the grievances that are causing the trouble in the South. However, the situation is completely separate from the situation in the South. However, the situation is completely separate from the situation in the South. However, the situation is completely separate from the situation in the South.

Many Negroes in Omaha feel that they are being forced to live in ghettos. In some cases, they feel that they are being forced to live in housing conditions that are subhuman. They are forced to live in overcrowded slums, where they are subjected to a continual threat of violence and the possibility of a flare up of a race war. The situation in Omaha is completely separate from the situation in the South. However, the situation is completely separate from the situation in the South. However, the situation is completely separate from the situation in the South.