

Foreign students . . . Language is chief difficulty

Rochester, N.Y. (I.P.) — What problems do foreign students face in adjusting to American culture and academic life?

In a new University of Sochester booklet based on a study of foreign students at the University, Muriel Nixon Rising, UR foreign student advisor, and Barbara Copp, a graduate student from Canada, report on adjustment experiences in such areas as:

Language. This is the chief difficulty for most foreign students, particularly those whose native language is structurally very different from English (e.g., Asian languages). Students whose ability to use English is limited may find humanities courses harder than technical or scientific courses, since technical terms are likely to be similar in all languages. They also report more difficulty in understanding lectures and conversation than in reading and writing in English.

GRADING. Because in many countries exams are given only at the end of the year, foreign students frequently are not used to mid-term exams, quizzes and homework.

Some are unfamiliar with objective tests; however, a few students from Asia report that they are accustomed to more objective tests, based on memorization. (One student complained that professors would not change grades, as is fairly common in other countries.)

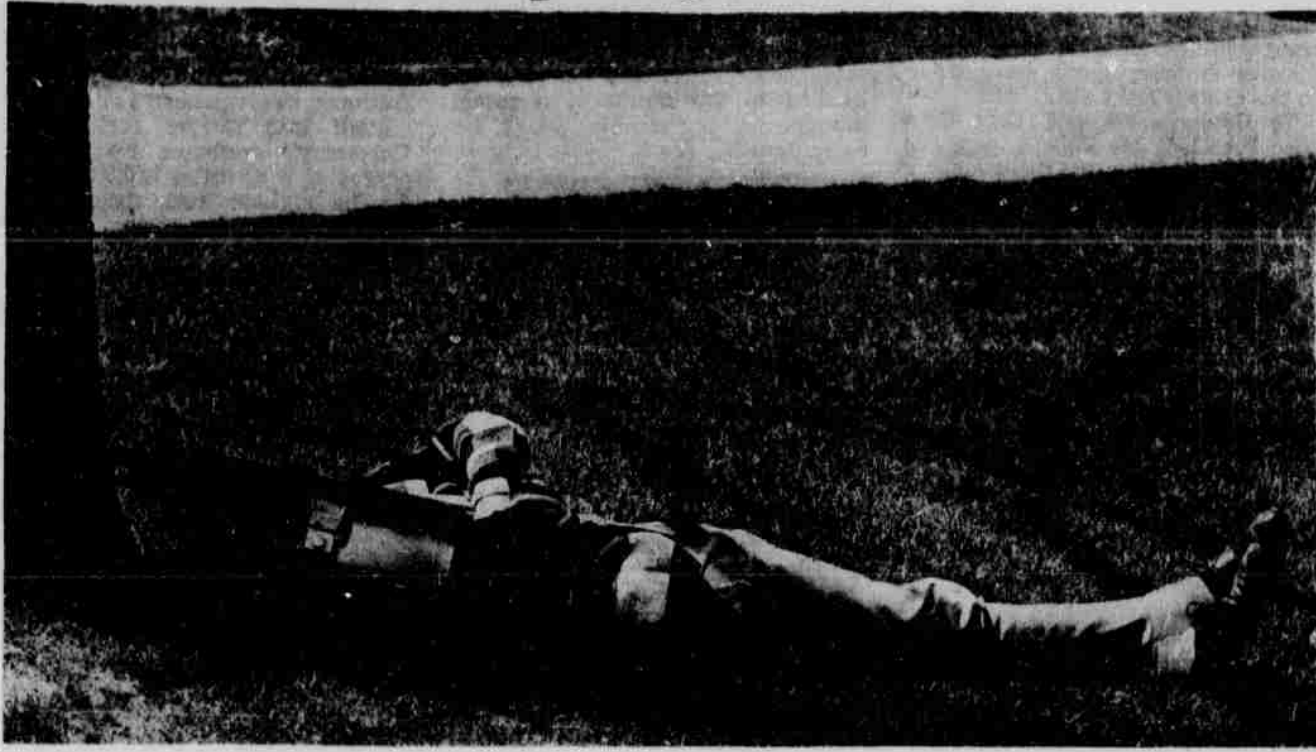

Student-faculty relationships. Some foreign students have trouble adjusting to the informal relations between U.S. faculty and students. Many male students initially find it difficult to accept women as teachers.

RELATIONSHIPS with other students. Most foreign students said that Americans are friendly and cooperative. Nearly all said they had American friends, but many felt the friendships were superficial or involved only academic matters. (Some thought that Americans are "too busy to become involved with foreigners.")

Most find dating "too expensive." Some Europeans consider the American dating system too formal. Asians and Africans report the most difficulty in adjusting. Of those who do date, most date other foreign students.

Campus life. Many foreign students report difficulty in finding rooms because of insufficient facility with English and because of discrimination that "the University should take the initiative in providing accommodations for foreign students."

Huskers keep looking for coach

Nebraska basketball coach Joe Cipriano is continuing his search Monday for a replacement for assistant basketball coach Bill Harrell.

Harrell, who has been at NU two years, has accepted the head basketball coaching position at Morehead State University in Kentucky. He will report to the new school in mid-May.

The former athletic director and head basketball coach at Shelby County High School in Shelbyville, Ky., served as NU's assistant varsity coach his first year, and this past season coached the NU freshman squad to a 9-3 record.

His 11 year coaching record in high school shows 244 victories and 82 losses and his prep teams during his last four years of coaching won 106 games and lost only 16 matches. He has coached 3 championship teams, including the Kentucky State title squad in 1966.

He was named Kentucky coach of the year in 1965 and won Associated Press and United Press International Coach of the Year honors in 1965 and 1966.

"He's added a lot of new ideas to our program," Cipriano said, "and we hate to see him go."

Monday's Nebraskan last issue

Monday's Daily Nebraskan will be the last issue this semester. It will be a 10-page paper, including interviews with students and faculty whom the Nebraskan editorial staff has chosen based on their ideas, goals and thoughts.

Rather than name Outstanding Nebraskans, as in the past, the Nebraskan has chosen this semester to present members of the University community whose contributions reflect their beliefs and commitments. The Nebraskan will resume publication the first week of the semester next September.
