

Hotel Majestic outdraws Eiffel

by Ron Whitten
Nebraska Staff Writer

The most popular tourist attraction in Paris today is no longer the Eiffel Tower, Arc de Triomphe del l'Etoile or Louvre. It is Hotel Majestic, where once a week the United States and Viet-name delegations meet to discuss the terms for an end to the war in Vietnam.

The peace talks delegates have encountered one another sixty-four times without any apparent success.

Meanwhile in Saigon, a South Vietnamese boy doesn't realize that he has hoisted a distress signal.

The diplomatic tactic of stubbornness which prevails has turned the talks into a series of obstinate recitals of foreign policy.

The first official proposal for the talks occurred on March 31, 1968. President Lyndon Johnson, addressing a nationwide television audience, announced a halt to bombing in the North Vietnam and said that, "The United States is ready to send its representatives to any forum, at any time, to discuss the means of bringing this ugly war to an end." Ironically, the impact of that proposal was momentarily forgotten when Johnson concluded by informing the nation that he would not seek re-nomination.

Hanoi three days later agreed to meet and offered Phnom Penh, Cambodia, or Warsaw as possible sites. Washington rejected both cities on the grounds that "an impartial atmosphere" would be unobtainable. The United States offered for consideration fifteen different sites, all located in neutral countries. The North Vietnamese refused all fifteen.

France saved the talks from an early grave by offering its capital city. Both adversaries consented and the first meeting was held May 13.

The similarities ended once the two governments were inside the Hotel Majestic. The talks began with DRV delegate Xuan Thuy demanding that American forces, which had re-established

War and protest—military viewpoint

by Sara Schwieder
Nebraska Staff Writer

"People in the military can say what they think," according to an ROTC professor. "I can say that I am not happy about Vietnam. Just because I wear a uniform doesn't mean that I must not think."

The professor is Col. William Gist, a career military officer and head of the Army ROTC department.

Col. Gist is not against the war in Vietnam, however. He feels that as long as we are there, we must fight it. He says the President is doing all he can to extricate us from the war, and American citizens should back him up in his efforts.

"We ought to give the guy a chance," he said. "For one thing, protestors are playing right into the hands of the North Vietnamese and making progress at the peace table more difficult."

"How can they get anything done if half of the population is not supporting their President?," Gist asked.

The colonel said, however, that there is nothing wrong with protesting.

"I think the moratorium is fine," he said. "I think everyone has a right to express his own opinions. It doesn't do any good, though, except to the peace movement itself. It reinforces convictions of those who are participating in the movement."

Gist feels that students are serious, but he noted that the people who complain the most don't do anything about their beliefs.

He speculated that the reason so many people are unhappy is because the war has been carried on for so long.

Gist said one of the main problems in Vietnam is morale. Troubles with the South Vietnamese Army are caused by poor pay and a "reluctance to do battle," he said.

Lately you probably have seen or heard much about ROTC. But how much do you know about the ROTC program and the advantages it offers for you, as an American citizen, as a taxpayer, an employer, a parent or a student? Here are the facts.

What ROTC means to you.

- As an American citizen. For 150 years, the idea of developing leadership on civilian college campuses has provided intelligent, well-educated officers for national defense. This idea is typically American. It is in keeping with our American concepts of the citizen-soldier and civilian control over our military forces. It provides civilian-oriented leadership from all geographic and social strata of our society. It has produced successful leadership that is characterized by initiative, ingenuity and flexibility. And, since ROTC officers have the choice of returning to civilian life when they have fulfilled their military obligation, it provides a unique national resource of leadership, not only for national defense but also for civilian enterprise.
- As a taxpayer. By preparing students for officer commissions while they earn their college degrees, ROTC produces officers in large numbers at a considerably lower cost than any other system.
- As an employer. ROTC adds another dimension to the college graduate's education by developing his ability to organize, motivate and lead men. Experience as an officer develops maturity, dependability, responsibility and other qualities needed in management positions.
- As a parent. ROTC provides financial assistance which may help you reduce the burden of providing your son with a college education. Approximately 14,900 students will attend college this school year on ROTC scholarships. For school year 1970-71, 16,500 ROTC scholarships will be available, on a competitive basis, for outstanding students. These scholarships pay for tuition, books and lab fees and provide a subsistence allowance of $50 per month. Non-scholarship ROTC students also receive $50 per month during the ROTC advanced course, normally taken during the junior and senior years of college.
- As a student. ROTC enables you to earn your college degree and a commission at the same time and to fulfill your military obligation as an officer. It develops leadership ability and other qualities which are assets while you are in college and in any career you may choose. Most employers prefer college graduates with ROTC leadership training and officer experience and many pay more to get them.
