

Schramm...

Eyster said that his study also relied heavily on research done by Dr. Joseph Katz in his book No Time for Youth, a four-year in-depth study of American campus life.

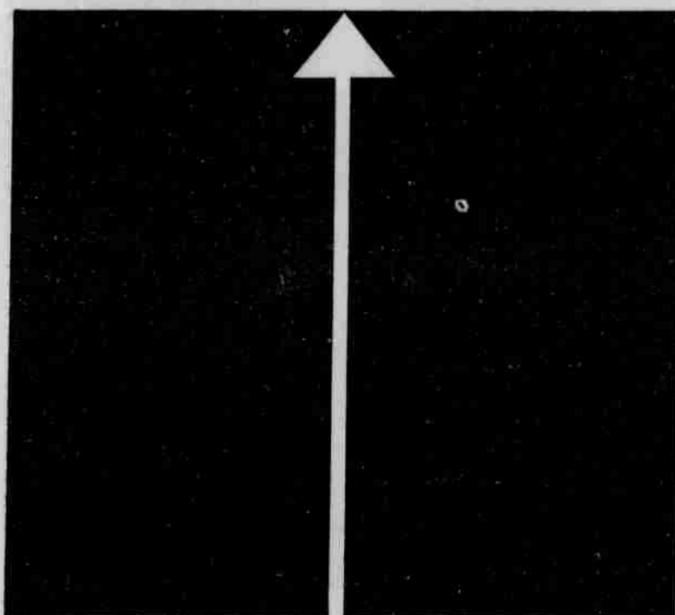

"From this research it became evident that socially segregated dorms tend to discourage male-female relationships based on the personal qualities of the individuals," Eyster said. "This type of living situation tends to play up the practice of looking at people as sex objects."

"What we are trying to do, then, is provide individuals a chance to drop their facade without being hurt or ridiculed," he said.

Eyster said that the Schramm proposal is only one of many residence possibilities that will allow the kind of personal and social relationships many people desire.

Students live in at Omaha

Miller and his wife, Kathie, a white girl, were married in 1966 in Cincinnati, Ohio.

"You're never really aware of color when you're with the other person," Miller said. "When we're among strangers, however, we do get a reaction."

"We got a tremendous reaction at the movie, 'Guess Who's Coming to Dinner,'" Miller recalled.

"The black movement today is so intense that sometimes it's hard for me to reconcile my marriage," Miller said. "Neither my wife or I have regretted marrying interracially."

Miller said his wife is accepted by the black community. "We worry about the day when Erik will be going to school," Miller said. "We're trying to provide him with a color strength."

Miscegenation may be the ultimate thing in making people all the same color, Miller said, but "as for solving all racial problems there must be complete understanding."

Dating interracially because it's the thing to do is unfortunate, Miller contended. Couples who marry interracially should love and understand each other completely.

"If you're really concerned about what people think and becoming a success materially, don't marry interracially," Miller advised.

Father Ken Vavrina of Sacred Heart church challenged the group with his question, "How many of you have the courage to challenge another white kid when he says nigger?"

"It won't make you any friends," Vavrina said, "but, hey baby, this is conviction."

"None of you can imagine the desperation of being a young black person with no hope," he said. Blacks, even those who have graduated from high school, are at least two years behind whites scholastically, Vavrina said.

"The church is now a restroom — a place where people can relieve themselves of their anxieties and have 45 minutes of peace," Vavrina said.

Instead, the church should be a health spa, he said, a place to build up strength and find dynamism to cope with the issues of today.

Vavrina said progress was being made, but "it is painfully slow. I think that if it had not been for organized protest, the black man would still be shining shoes," he said.

Violence is not the answer, Vavrina remarked. "Riots are not racial protest. The looting and killing is only a repercussion of frustration. All it causes is an immediate backlash."

Student reaction to the live-in was characterized by confusion and inability to significantly remedy the situation in the white community.

Howard Rosenberg, freshman, explained that he experienced a sense of futility when he visited a shop on 24th street. "I knew they really didn't want me there."

"It's no longer a time to philosophize in our ivory towers," Rosenberg commented. "It's a time to work. You look at the kids and you know you're not enough."

Dave Moore, senior, said, "I still feel an incompetence to understand what is really happening. I feel insignificant — I know so little — maybe I should start trying."

"One thing I can do in my own clique is to cast an evil eye on overt racism," Moore said. "I've got to get people to see that this isn't right."
