

University must change

by MICK MORIARTY

Nebraskan Staff Writer

In a parting shot at the University of Nebraska, Ivan Volgyes, assistant professor of political science, said that the University must change or college degrees will become worthless.

Before leaving on a one year sabbatical, Volgyes spoke at a rap session Wednesday in the Nebraska Union.

Volgyes said that in five years there will be two and one-half million graduates entering the labor market and there will only be 400,000 jobs available.

"There simply will not be any jobs for graduates and don't be surprised if you end up working in a gas station" Volgyes told about 100 students in the Nebraska Union.

"There's not a goddamn thing you can do with a bachelors degree," Volgyes said. "If you go to work for business, you end up taking special training courses anyway," he said.

Volgyes said that the universities must meet the needs of the people. "They are not doing this now but I believe that they can if we only convince the taxpayers that the university can help them," he said.

Volgyes emphasized that change can come from within the system, although he was doubtful that violent change could be avoided in America, "where violence is so central to our system."

He warned students, "Don't play with revolution. Once you have taken the ultimate course, no longer can change come non-violently."

Volgyes told students to remember that the end result of a revolution would be totalitarianism. But he also said that if people don't work for change now, then totalitarianism would come another way.
