Hardin receives telegram appeal

Over 600 University of Nebraska students and faculty have signed a telegram to Secretary of Agriculture Clifford M. Hardin asking him to use his "influence in the Cabinet and public arena to stop this folly in Asia."

The signers said the former NU chancellor is their "closest link to the center of decision-making in our government."

They asked Hardin to "recognize that this Cambodian adventure has aroused immense anxiety and suspicion among large numbers of people, within both the University community and within the larger community, and immeasurably heightened potentially destructive antagonism."

Strike committee contacts workers

In an open letter to the United Rubber Workers Local 286, the NU Strike Committee said Friday, "In your attempt to arrive at an equitable solution of dispute with Goodyear, we as students at the University of Nebraska are in complete sympathy."

In their bid to lend their support, the committee said it would "welcome the opportunity to participate in your strike by walking with you on your picket lines."

Nothing resolved

Sunday's town hall meeting in the Coliseum, which should have resolved everything about the strike, resolved nothing. The issue at hand was never discussed. In what may have been a prime example of how democracy can be subverted, a group of students tied the meeting up in the endless red tape of parliamentary procedure until the patience of virtually every student present was exhausted.

Furthermore, the meeting never was controlled by the chair or anyone else. When this situation was at its worst, the question was called on whether or not to continue the strike and a secret ballot was taken. In short, Sunday's meeting, regardless of the number of students there, did not solve the problem.

In all probability, students would have voted to end the strike at any meeting and the results will show it. But the failure of students to discuss the ramifications, good or bad, of a continued strike is unfortunate. That students didn't discuss any alternatives to an end of the strike is disgusting. When students left that meeting they were more befuddled and confused about whether or not the strike should be continued than when they entered.

At Monday's meeting, students must decide where to go from here. They must decide what has been effective and ineffective in protesting the war in the last four days. They must decide whether the student body should support any form of class boycott or protest, or whether the burden of the protest and strike which has been carried by ASUN should be taken up by organizations existing for the sole purpose of carrying on the protest. They must decide if the student body will endorse a form of "individual strike" where students committed to working for peace full-time can arrange with their professors to miss classes. They must decide if students will work to persuade the Faculty Senate to adopt a non-sanction attitude towards students who, out of conscience, continue to strike.

What is more, students should have the opportunity to hear Randy Reeves, Ken Wald, and Chuck Faulkner report from Washington. Possibly, more than anything else, their report should help students decide what direction any form of protest should take now.

At any rate, students must decide on an alternative at today's town meeting; they cannot leave the question up in the air. The war is endless and the problem may be endless, but students must decide on a course of action. Hopefully they will use, rather than abuse, the democratic process.
