

Intramural departments unite

The men's intramural, women's recreation and faculty recreation departments have combined to form a new Intramural and Recreation Department for all students and faculty on campus.

The new department will be headed by intramural and recreation directors Ray Chatfield and Kermit McMurry. Nancy Sonner and Ina Anderson were recently added to the staff.

Sonner and Anderson want more student participation in the new recreation program.

"The recreation program will be successful only if the students make it successful" explained Anderson.

"We're here as a central source. We want students to participate in the program and to make suggestions on what activities they would like added to the program."

Thus far, coed flag-football, volleyball and basketball have been added to the program by student suggestions.

Anderson, who has been a women's physical education instructor at Nebraska for six years, feels that there is a problem with facilities. "Sports activities have become too fragmented. There are sports going on in the men's physical education building and women's physical education building as well as the Coliseum, field house and University High gym all at the same time," Anderson said.

Anderson believes the solution to the problem is fairly simple. "If the University had one big recreation building," she said, "we would be able to have all the activities under one roof."

However, Anderson admits that getting a recreation building constructed is no easy matter. "The students have to prove there is a need for the building by participating in the recreation program," Anderson explained.
