

Hyde Park cites racial problem

Thursday's session of Hyde Park, the open forum for discussion, again dipped into many subjects but the most lengthy topic was the racial problem in America and particularly on the UNL campus.

The subject was kicked off by Jerome Drakeford, a black student who asked the audience why events like the recent prison revolt and subsequent death of many prisoners at Attica State Prison occurs in the U.S.

After several white students had voiced their opinions of the race situation in America, the consensus seemed to be that racism is definitely present in America.

It was suggested that white students are generally apathetic and concern themselves less with the equality of their fellow man than with more trivial matters such as the recently enacted bicycle ordinance, which was briefly discussed.

Drakeford persisted in his discussion of the white racist society citing the higher number of black prisoners, stating that blacks had actually begun many of the movements which white students involve themselves in, and pointing out the low number of black students on the University of Nebraska campuses.

Last year, he said, the University had the lowest percentage of black students in the United States.

An unidentified black man berated the black students, however, telling them they were playing the white man's game.

Earlier in the afternoon Charley Dalrymple had suggested a bike-in to protest the recent City Council ruling which allows the council to regulate bike traffic on major traffic routes. Ed Anson suggested that a bike-in is "sort of crude" and more imaginative forms of protest might be found if they become necessary.

A dorm resident briefly protested the rejection of the dorm visitation policy which has been proposed. He pointed to statistics from a questionnaire which indicated that a majority of the respondents favored the open dorm policy.

Before the major portion of the discussion began, the Union lobby crowd was treated to a piano rendition of "The Little White Cloud That Cried."

Fifteen years of garbage to be junked in clean-up

On September 27 a 15-year accumulation of junk from UNL buildings will be thrown out or reassigned to new departments, the administration hopes.

The University is "terribly short of storage space," explained Ronald Wright, assistant director of business and finance.

Department heads and deans have been getting ready for the clean-up since early September.

On the 27th members of the UNL job pool will remove heavy articles such as boxes of old texts, old exams, and unused desks or chairs.

The inventory section of the University purchasing department will sort through the equipment and reassign the material where necessary.

Some items will be stored in a warehouse on East Campus.

WHAT DOES IT TAKE TO LOVE YOUR ENEMY?

Something more than human love.

It takes a more spiritual look at yourself and the other fellow. An understanding that you both have the same Father-Mother. God.

It takes realizing that no man is your enemy.
