TONIC takes aim at Indian dropouts

Up to 20 percent of the black children in the U.S. do not finish high school. That statistic is high, but members of one UNL group point out that the drop-out rate for American Indians is 80 per cent.

Tutors of Nebraska Children (TONIC) is out to lower that statistic according to member Keith Hodges. The group cooperates with the Winnebago Indian Tribal Council in Winnebago to try to keep children in school.

TONIC members help the children with their reading, writing and 'rithmetic studies, Hodges explained, but only if that's what the children want to do.

He said usually the tutors bring educational games or art supplies for the children to work with. One time a member brought a crystal radio and used that as the basis for a lesson

Hodges said UNL students leave from Andrews Hall at 4:30 p.m. Thursdays, and are back on campus by about midnight. Winnebago is about 100 miles northeast of Lincoln. He said TONIC is not trying to make the children white, but merely to help them be Indian in a white culture. TONIC has held some Indian culture classes and would like to hold more, he said. But a lack of qualified teachers is the main problem.

TONIC started up about two years ago under the University's now-defunct Tri-University program, dedicated to progressive "active classroom" methods of elementary education.

Hodges said new tutors are needed. TONIC will hold an organizational meeting Thursday at 7 p.m. in the Nebraska Union.

Survey backs UNO expansion

A survey of college and university business office personnel from across the country shows that almost three-fourth of the respondents favor some land expansion for the UNO campus.

The survey, taken by State Senator David H. Stahmer of Omaha, questioned people who had attended a one-week short course at the UNO campus in July. The questionaire asked whether the person favored a high density UNO expansion plan or a proposal of acquiring land to the west.

Over 250 questionaires were mailed out and more than 160 were returned, Stahmer said. He presented his finding to the Board of Regents Monday. With the report he included comments sent back with the questionaires.

One respondent commented:

"Lets say for discussion's sake that you get these additional 7,000 students (The questionaire contained a projected enrollment figure of 20,000), and that you decide to densify your present 52 acres by building taller classroom buildings and high rise parking facilities.

"As it stands now, UNO does not have any dormitories, which means that during class breaks you will have anywhere from 4,000 to 10,000 cars attempting to enter or leave the campus via your only arterial thoroughfare, Dodge St.

"IT WAS MY observation while at the short course that you probably reached the optimum point for traffic congestion several years back."

Another respondent commented that he found it "hard to believe that the small acreage at UNO could handle its present volume of students.

"University life should be enriching and stimulating.' another respondent commented, "and this atmosphere is not unrelated to environment. If the University of Nebraska hopes to fulfill this need there is no question but that I would strongly advocate the number 2 proposal (expansion)."

"A COMMUNITY of 20,000 needs air space as well as buildings," another wrote.

But, some were not so enthusiastically for land expansion and against high density plans.

"I support, in part, the acquisition of more land for university expansion but would not consider additional parking lots an esthetic element in the expansion program. Blacktop surfaces are ugly structures. Although multilevel parking is more expensive, the heauty saved is more likely a justified cost."
