

NU houses largest TV film library

The largest distributor of educational films and tapes in the nation is headquartered below the stands of the west end of Memorial Stadium on the UNL Campus.

The Great Plains National Instructional Television Library is a self-supporting agency of the University's television department, soon to leave the stadium for the new ETV building on East Campus.

Instituted in 1962, the Great Plains Library is a self-supporting agency and is the country's largest distributor of educational films and tapes. More than 75,000 separate recorded lesson-units have been distributed by the Library since 1962 according to Richard Spence, information coordinator.

The Library operates on a use-lease plan. The "telecourse" user pays the duplication and service fees plus a royalty payment which is returned to the original producer. "The Library serves only to distribute material, not to produce it," Spence said.

Programs range from "Sounds like Magic", a series of thirty 15-minute lessons for primary grades, to "Shakespeare," thirty 45-minute lessons making up a Literature 211 course.

A University survey made in 1960-61 found that many schools around the country had produced television courses for their own use, many of these courses are preserved on high quality video tape. For both the economic and educational benefits of sharing such courses the U.S. Office of Education (USOE) financed regional distribution centers.

Introducing stationery for people who think saving a tree is important.

Earthnotes is 100% recycled quality stationery. It's made entirely from waste material. Trash.

Using recycled paper saves trees, reduces pollution, and cuts down on waste.

But recycling only works when there is a demand for waste material. And this demand is created only when people buy recycled products.

By buying Earthnotes, and other recycled paper products, you create a market for recycled paper. And help to save more trees.

Each box contains 50 Monarch size sheets, 30 matching envelopes and 30 "Save-a-Tree" stickers so you can spread the recycling message. It's available in white or pastel "earth colors".
