New history course studies urban growth

A course offered by the UNL History Department next semester will attempt to "make the modern city more understandable" by examining the history of urban growth, according to the course instructor.

History 197A, The Rise of U.S. Cities, will examine the development of towns and the problems which have been encountered as urban areas have grown in population, said James Schneider.

The course will examine towns from several geographical and chronological areas of American history. Included will be the colonial towns of New England, the Mississippi River towns of the early 19th century and the 19th century cattle towns of the South and Southwest.

Schneider said he will emphasize the development of institutions in American cities, particularly the police force. A study of the Boston police force of the 19th century and police reaction to urban violence will be included.

The course will also examine the architecture and patterns of city planning in the larger 19th century cities. In addition, the patterns of mobility within the city and ethnic relationships will be investigated.

The course, as tentatively designed, will cover the growth of the American city from the colonial period to the early 20th century. Schneider said the course would probably not include an examination of the modern metropolis which began to take shape near the start of the 20th century.

He called the course "very relevant. About 80 per cent of Americans live, or will live, in urban areas. Students should find it exciting to discover the ways in which cities have grown."
