CSL votes to drop 12-hour rule

The Council on Student Life voted Thursday to drop the 12-hour requirement for student participation in extra-curricular activities. The Council's action will be sent to interim Chancellor C. Peter Magrath and is subject to review by the University of Regents.

The resolution to drop the requirement passed by a vote of 8-6 after several weeks of debate. The resolution changes the regulation in the Campus Handbook to allow all students regularly enrolled in the University, excluding those enrolled only in correspondence courses, to participate in extra-curricular activities.

The requirement of a cumulative grade average of at least a 2.0 wasn't changed by Council action.

The Council's resolution also states that each organization retains the right to set standards for participation, so that an organization may retain the 12-hour rule if it chooses.

Samuel B. Treves, geology professor and president of the Faculty Senate's Committee on Committees asked the Council to exempt Faculty Senate committees from the rule change. However, he was informed that the Faculty Senate still retains the right to set a 12-hour requirement for student committee members.

The rule change is aimed at allowing part-time students, who pay student fees, to participate in activities and to have representation on student governing groups, according to Meg Hall, author of the resolution.

The main objection to the rule change seemed to be that someone could enroll for one hour of credit and take a leadership role in activities although he would not be representative of the student body.

CSL member Dave Rasmussen introduced an alternative proposal by the Agriculture Advisory Board. The proposal would retain the 12-hour rule but would allow students in executive positions in organizations to drop up to six hours once elected.

The proposal wasn't accepted by CSL, but Rasmussen said he will introduce it at next week's meeting as an amendment to the resolution passed by the Council.
