

Conference ends in complaints

Strong dissatisfaction with the structure of the Third National Conference on Experimental Colleges surfaced at the confab's windup session Sunday at the Nebraska Center for Continuing Education on UNL's East Campus.

Scattered applause followed remarks by one student participant who said the conference was unexperimental and unresponsive to the intellectual needs of those attending.

OTHERS WERE critical of what they called a rigid format of workshops and panels. Some proposed future conferences be unstructured—just a group of people meeting to discuss common problems and philosophies.

Student co-chairman for the Centennial College hosted event, Robin West, explained that the conference was geared toward an exchange of information on experimental colleges and their problems—which approaches have worked and which haven't—which was apparently not satisfactory with some participants.

SHE, HOWEVER, termed the conference "very useful" to at least half of the nearly 400 participants, in particular to those just starting experimental programs.

Centennial College Senior Fellow Ted Beck, said later that the most vocal students appeared to come from Grand Valley State College in Michigan.

He called their criticism a philosophical difference toward educational change, characterizing them as looking for a totally free environment which he said was an anti-historical, anti-traditional approach to education. "Others," he added, "move against tradition on other grounds."

OTHERS APPRAISED the conference and workshops as highly productive, Beck said.

Workshops dealt with experimental college evaluation, financing, methods for establishing and maintaining them, curriculum, internal government, learning and community feeling.

In other business, there was talk of establishing a national clearing house and information center for experimental educational programs, however no firm decision was made by noon Sunday.

Model UN to debate China issue

The purpose of the Model United Nations January 27, 28 and 29 is to give students a chance to experience the actual situations and problems that arise in the United Nations.

According to Colleen Harper, Model U.N. Secretary General, one of the most controversial subjects currently in discussion, the China representation issue, will be on the Model U.N. agenda.

"STUDENTS will be given an opportunity to discuss the subject of China's representation in keeping with our model," Harper said.

The model concept allows the students to treat hypothetical situations as real countries would, but also allows for the opportunity to create a new idea.

The Chinese Delegation, said James Kelley, President of the General Assembly, will consider the issues in perspective to past and present actions and be able to consider possible alternatives.

POSSIBLE options proposed are: (1) retain the government of Nationalist China; (2) seat the People's Republic and expel Nationalist China; (3) seat both; (4) suspend the seating for further study.

According to Kelley, option four has not been discussed in the U.N., but it could possibly be a workable solution.

A FREE University course beginning November 16 and lasting approximately five weeks, will inform the participating students on parliamentary procedure and research techniques.

Ivan Volgyes, UNL political science professor, will speak at the November 16 meeting. Volgyes will speak on the consequences of the seating of the Communist Chinese delegation.

The Research Library in Room 237 of the Nebraska Union will open November 15. Students who have had no previous experience with Model U.N. will benefit from the use of the library.

Some 70 delegations participated in last year's Model U.N. and more are expected this year. Interested students can apply at the Union Program Office.
