Symphonies . . .

dance bands, theater pits and night clubs was a steadier source of income.

In Los Angeles, for example, the Philharmonic's day off was established on Monday--so the orchestra members could moonlight on the Lux Radio Theater.

"When I started with the orchestra in 1931 the base pay was $31 a week and the season was much shorter," says Richard Kelley of the Los Angeles Philharmonic. "It's only been in the last three or four years that a musician has been able to live off nothing but his salary."

THE LOW PAY also meant a generally lower quality of musicianship and a far smaller talent pool. "When I first auditioned for Klemperer," says clarinetist Kalman Bloch, another Philharmonic veteran, "I called him up, then went to his house, played one or two selections and that was it. Today there are ads in the papers and 40 good people show up for one opening."

But considering the skills and long training, symphony musicians are still underpaid. For one thing, the salaries are rarely year-around. As a rule, musicians get paid only during the orchestra's season.

"Still, there are lots worse jobs to have," says Lloyd Gowen, a piccolo player with the San Francisco Symphony.

"We do resent the fact that we all studied many years to develop our skills and that many times a carpenter outearns us. But we supplement our salaries with teaching. I'm not rich, but I'm not unhappy and my wife doesn't have to work."

The strength and the willingness of the musicians' unions to strike has also increased the self-confidence of the average orchestra member. He is even developing a new attitude toward that still-towering figure, the conductor.

IT HAS NEVER been easy for a new conductor to step in and dominate an orchestra but now he has to be very good, indeed, to get the job done. "Some of them step over conductors," says one well-known music director. "A lot of us would like to send our worst enemy to conduct the New York Philharmonic."

The new pride of the musician is best exemplified in the words of Gordon Staples, concertmaster of the Detroit Symphony. "Conducting is about the only activity in the music business where a faker can get by," he says. "And remember, there's no sound coming out of a baton and I've yet to hear a sonata written for one."
