

'Agri— business will spark economy'

Agribusiness will provide the key to Nebraska's economic growth in the coming decade, according to the chairman of UNL's animal science department.

In a recent speech Frank Baker said the growth of livestock industry projects, such as processing and distributing Nebraska-produced meat from Nebraska packing plants, will ensure a parallel growth in the state's economy.

Major attention in achieving such a growth should be placed on expanding the state's nationwide and worldwide meat marketing program, Baker stated.

The University also has a major opportunity to assist in the state's growth by increased concentration on the animal sector of its program, according to Baker. For example, all agriculture students should take several courses in livestock production and meat processing, he said.

And he said extension programs of the University should provide opportunities for young farmers to improve their managerial abilities.

Baker also recommended that agriculture students participate in summer training programs in specialized livestock operations and/or agribusiness firms.

Baker was speaking to the UNL Agribusiness Economics Club at a dinner in the Nebraska Union.

ASUN examines book exchange

Unsold texts which students did not retrieve Monday following the close of the book exchange can be picked up from 1-5 p.m. this week at the ASUN office in the Nebraska Union, according to exchange manager Terry Wittler.

He said unclaimed books will not be available after Friday. The ASUN sponsored project was designed to provide a non-profit clearinghouse for students with the hope that they would receive more for their used texts than the bookstores offer, Wittler said.

Texts were sold at prices set by the students who brought the books in. A small handling fee was added to help cover the expenses of publicity and printed receipts. The stacks were manned by 12 student volunteers.

Approximately 1,800 books were brought in, he said, of which 800 were sold.

The exchange will continue next fall if it is deemed both financially sound and useful following an evaluation of this semester's efforts, Wittler noted.

Two semesters ago student fees were needed to keep the project out of the red, but last semester it was self-supporting.
