

Freund urges faculty action

"UNO wants to be recognized as a separate collective bargaining unit. If the regents determine that we aren't, we take the matter to court," Eugene Freund, UNO professor, told 35 faculty members at a joint meeting of the American Federation of Teachers (AFT) and the American Association of University Professors (AAUP) Monday.

The UNL AFT claiming 10 per cent of UNL faculty, and the AAUP sponsored the meeting featuring Herbert Heneman, professor at the University of Minnesota, and Freund.

Past bargaining methods may not continue to be appropriate, Heneman said. "We are now facing employment pollution. It is time for faculty to have a different form of government."

Lobbying, educating the legislature and getting the support of the majority of faculty are all very important. Striking would be the very last resort, Heneman said.

On the UNO campus one third of the faculty are AFT members and 60 per cent have signed pledge cards granting the AFT the right to do collective bargaining in their behalf.

"In Nebraska we are still fighting the preliminaries in collective bargaining. Many people in Nebraska are neutral or negative. UNO, the medical center and UNL all need to be recognized separately as collective bargaining units," Freund commented.

Freund is not optimistic about a timetable. He explained it would take nine months to one year to negotiate.

"If faculty on this campus (UNL) don't get together, collective bargaining will be completely out of their hand," he said.

Paul Olson, foundation professor in English and president of the UNL AFT commented, "I think we should congratulate UNO for their actions. I don't think it will go to court. The regents are reasonable men and will probably support it."

The UNO faculty are well organized while UNL is disorganized, Olson said. About half of the faculty at UNL support some kind of union, he added.

"But we are not sure where we stand or if we have enough support yet. The faculty is not eager. They don't sense any difference from three years ago."

"It is important to organize now however. The UNO action is not a threat but should stimulate action here at UNL. We ought to come to some decisions later this spring," Olson said.

Students staff rest stops as vacation guides

Students will be employed as vacation guides at Interstate rest stops across Nebraska during the upcoming tourist season as a result of an agreement between UNL and the Nebraska Department of Economic Development last week.

The announcement was made by Fred Anderson, UNL financial aids adviser and John Rosenow, state travel director.

The guides will work at information booths being built at most of the rest stops on I-80 and will answer tourists' questions and hand out literature on tourist attractions in the state, Anderson said.

Guides will participate in a pre-season training session in May to learn their duties and become acquainted with the state's major tourist attractions in a tour of the state.

The work week for the guides will not exceed 40 hours and the wage scales range from $1.60 per hour for freshmen to $1.90 per hour for seniors.

Workers will be assigned to stops near their hometowns or near their summer homes.

Anderson said guides will work as managers and will have freedom to exercise some creativity.

He explained the students requesting assignment as Nebraska Vacation Guides must get the acceptance for summer work from the Scholarships and Financial Aids office. All guides will be on the work-study program he said.

Anderson also said other work-study positions may open with businessmen around the state.

Questions regarding further information about the Department of Economic Development Summer Vacation Guide Program should be directed to John Rosenow or Fred Anderson in Scholarships and Financial Aids.
