becoming more open and he expects an upswing in the number of homosexual VD cases in the next few years.

A University Health Service community health nurse, Celeste Knipmeyer, refused to estimate the number of homosexuals who are treated for VD at UHS.

"Homosexuals do come in here," she said, "but I can't tell how many. When they come in they are usually infected in either the mouth or the rectum."

An infection of the rectum is difficult to detect, she said. The chancre, a boil-like blemish that appears when a person has VD, usually forms inside the rectum in such cases. Since the chancre is not visible and there is little pain the disease is more difficult to detect, she explained.

Both Knipmeyer and Jensen said most male homosexuals who come in for treatment are the active partner in the relationship. When that person is diagnosed he normally tells his passive partner and other contacts, they said.

Soreness in the rectal area is one sign of venereal disease, said Jensen. Another sign, Knipmeyer said, is a sore throat.
