Minority Affairs still lacks director

What does a department at UNL do when it has lost its head? Since Leroy Ramsey left the position in early July, the Minority Affairs department hasn't had a director but Davis Williams, search committee chairman, has been hunting for one.

"We were shooting for a September 1 deadline, but obviously we will not make that one," Williams said. "We have not yet established a new deadline."

Until a new director takes over, who is heading Minority Affairs?

"Right now no one," Williams said. "The people who were there when Ramsey was there are carrying on the work."

"We have advertised the position in the Chronicle of Education and in the Lincoln and Omaha newspapers," Williams said. The advertisements have yielded about 25 applicants. All of the applicants have been screened and categorized as either acceptable or unacceptable, he said.

"Now we are beginning to screen more closely those applicants in the acceptable category," Williams said. "We hope to come up with three to five applicants and then turn them over to Ken Bader, vice chancellor of Student Affairs. It is my understanding that after we recommend them, he will have the final decision."

Ramsey, who originally came from New York to take the job, returned there to become the first chief of the Bureau of Educational Integration for the New York State Department of Education.
