

Unicameral to study NU paralegal need

The Nebraska Legislature's Education Committee is to take testimony Sept. 29 on a proposal being pushed by Omaha Sen. Glenn Goodrich—establishment of two and four-year "paralegal" courses in public colleges and universities.

Persons completing the courses would be able to become trained legal secretaries, legal assistants and legal administrators, helping attorneys in various tasks as paramedical people now aid physicians.

Committee members hinted at a Monday meeting they want to be shown there is a real need for a new program.

Obscenity salesman convicted, to appeal

A Lancaster County court jury determined last Friday that items which John Serafine was charged with selling or possessing were obscene according to local community standards.

The jury found Serafine, who had been charged with four counts of possessing or selling obscene items, guilty on three counts, and the court fined him a total of $1,700. Judge Ralph Slocum sustained a motion by the defense to dismiss one count of selling an obscene article described as a plastic or rubber male sex organ.

On request of the defense, who gave oral notice of appeal, Serafine was sentenced less than an hour after the jury returned the verdict.

Ronald Lahners, chief deputy county attorney, and Robert Gibson, deputy county attorney, told the jurors earlier that they must decide whether the average person applying contemporary community standards would find that the allegedly obscene items would appeal to his prurient interests. The jurors also were told that they must decide whether the items lacked any serious literary, artistic, political or scientific value.
