on alcohol and visitation, thinks the state's taxpayers should have some say about how the University is operated.

"It is not a question of whether alcohol will enhance education or not," Bader said. The issue is whether the full rights and responsibilities given to 19-year-olds by the Legislature should be granted by the University.

"I realize some people feel different about it," he concedes. However, the present policy opens the University to easy attacks for being hypocritical and not dealing with the real world, he said.

One issue which has frustrated students at many campuses are so-called parietal rules requiring that students live in approved University housing until they attain a certain age. For NU that age is 20, although the state's age of majority is 19.

"It is not contradictory in terms of legality," said Richard Armstrong, director of UNL's housing office. "The regents may promulgate any regulations they desire."

Such a rule Armstrong said is a "philosophical belief" that some educational value will be realized by having students live in a residence hall for part of their education.

Although he doesn't know why the 20-year age was decided on, he speculated at least one reason was to keep the dormitory system financially solvent. In other words, you can't pay off the bonds used to build the buildings if the dormitories aren't reasonably full.

The studies and committees on student rights at NU alone are too numerous to count. How much they have accomplished is even more difficult to determine. The deciding factor in gaining what students have coined the right of "self-determination" may be time.
