Agnew's rhetoric spiced state visits

Spiro Agnew, who resigned as U.S. vice president Wednesday, met with mixed reactions from Nebraskans on two tours here in recent year, according to stories in the Daily Nebraskan.

In February, 1970, the vice president was greeted by 500 protestors outside Pershing Auditorium at a $50-a-plate fund raising GOP dinner for then Gov. Norbert Tiemann.

While campaigning, Agnew made a somewhat quieter appearance years later at an Omaha press conference in October, 1972.

At the conference Agnew, who was sentenced Wednesday on a count of tax evasion, blasted Democratic Sen. George McGovern's (D-SD) tax proposals for trying to rob the American farmer.

He said McGovern knew he had "to get the money to pay for (his) give away schemes somewhere" and had decided to take it "out of the pocket of the American farmer."

Commenting on one of McGovern's proposals, the former vice president said an increase in inheritance tax would make it nearly impossible for the farmer's children to inherit his land.

He also said McGovern's proposals to eliminate the investment tax credit and capital gains provisions would increase farmers' taxes and drive up food prices.

He said he realized people wanted to hear "gung-ho rhetoric" but that certain statistics were important as a "measure of the administration's success."

For example, he said recent grain sales to Red China and Russia not only would help raise the farmer's profit from corn and wheat but would save the taxpayer money and create new jobs.

In response to a question about the Nixon Administration's status with young people, he said he believed most young voters support the President.

There were no antiwar or pro-McGovern protestors at the 1972 press conference.

At the 1970 dinner a crowd of protestors carried signs like "Every Hitler needs a Silent Majority" and "Thou Shalt not Kill, Except..." and chanted slogans like "No Agnews is good Agnews."

One 20-year-old protestor burned his induction notice.

When the crowd learned the vice president had eluded them by entering by the back door, some reacted with "Screw you Agnew" and by rattling the locked front doors.

A UNL political science professor said he was protesting because "I have always believed in getting out of Vietnam now." He said Agnew stands for "the worst in America."

Two-thirds of the 160-member Lincoln Police force was assigned to the demonstration, which was reported as peaceful throughout.
