Booth geared to social drinker

In an attempt to educate students about the effects of alcohol on driving, the Lincoln Alcohol Safety Action Project's "Alcohol Quotient" booth is on display in the Nebraska Union lounge.

The booth is "geared to the social drinker," according to Kae Skinner, community education specialist. It measures the blood alcohol content for each succeeding alcoholic beverage while taking into account an individual's weight.

The intent of the program, Skinner said, is to "reduce alcohol-related fatalities, injuries and property accidents."

Most of the program's emphasis is trying to identify the "problem drinker," who accounts for one-third of all highway fatalities, she said.

A driver with just .05 of one per cent of alcohol in the bloodstream is twice as likely to be involved in an automobile accident as a sober driver, she said.

If the blood alcohol rate reaches .10 of one per cent, an individual is seven times as likely to be involved in a serious accident and is considered intoxicated under Nebraska law, Skinner said.
