alcohol on campus and coed visitation with some restrictions.

"Students should have the choice of whether or not to possess alcohol (in campus living units)," he said. "The Legislature passed a law lowering the legal age to 19 in Nebraska. That law was to apply to all citizens of the state. The question now is whether the rights and responsibilities of that law should apply to students as citizens of Nebraska. The answer is yes."

Bader also said he supports liberalizing the visitation policies, with some restrictions.

"The opportunity should be provided for increased visitation in the dorms, although for security reasons, I am not in favor of 24-hour visitation," he said.

"The main thing about these issues is that a state university must be aware of all its constituents," he said, "including faculty, alumni, taxpayers and students."

"There is quite a variability of opinion among students on these issues, and you can't stereotype students into one particular bag. A university needs to offer a plurality of environments from which to choose," he said.

"When a student leaves a university, he must be able to cope with the outside world. A university shouldn't be an unreal experience for the student."

He said one reason for the alcohol issue controversy is that some people automatically see alcohol possession as detrimental to educational quality. He said he disagrees with that viewpoint.

"The University is doing a very, very fine job for the state of Nebraska. We have a good number of excellent faculty and staff personnel providing various programs for undergraduates. However, there are some shortcomings in our graduate programs," he said.

Bader said there are several changes he would like to see at UNL. He said that more attention needs to be given to educational opportunities for ethnic minorities.

"All students need to live and work in harmony. We have a long way to go to achieve that goal," he said.

He said that the university also should consider 18- and 19-year-old students as adults.

"The rights and responsibilities of these students should be stressed in the university environment. However, the types of changes we're talking about aren't going to take place immediately. Social change like this is slow," he said.

Bader said an area which would be hard to change is a general disenchantment with higher education by the public.

"There is a distrust or lack of understanding of what a university can offer a state. UNL is one of the most valuable resources the state has. Economically, the University adds much to the state. Students aren't the only ones that gain by an education. The state gains by those students who stay here after being educated," he said.

He said he thinks Nebraskans appreciate their university. However, he said he wishes there was as much support for UNL's academic programs as there is for NU's Big Red football.

"The university is a questioning experience. The questions may be embarrassing, but they must be asked," he said.

The Halloween star show can be seen today through Wednesday at 1:30 p.m. and 2:45 p.m.
