Weather delays library addition; completion date now early '75

Because of bad weather and initial "optimism on the part of everybody," completion of the addition to Love Library will be delayed three months, according to Adam C Breckenridge, acting director of UNL libraries.

The addition should be completed by early 1975, Breckenridge said. A further loss in time depends on two factors—the weather and shortage of materials, he added.

He said the cost of the addition won't exceed the $3.78 million budget.

"We're allotted a certain amount of money, and contractors agree to build for a certain amount of money," Breckenridge said.

He added that if there is an increase in the cost of materials, then it's the contractor's problem.

When the addition is completed, 500,000 books will be moved into it from the East

Campus, the law and undergraduate libraries.

"We will still operate the other libraries," Breckenridge said. "Love Library will be the main library and will contain material mainly related to social sciences, humanities and the arts."

He said he still doesn't know if there will be enough money to move the books into the addition, but they will be moved "one way or the other."

"The books won't have to be moved as soon as the addition is completed," Breckenridge said. "We'll move just a few books at a time if we have to."

Breckenridge said the University also is requesting another $800,000 to renovate the original part of Love Library. The money will be used for better lighting, new floor covering and a better heat control system.

Weather sets Love Library construction back another three months.

Free U offering collage of courses

The Nebraska Free University (NFU) is back this semester, offering courses ranging from conversational Spanish to how to say "I love you among the post and pans," according to its chairman, Dave Howlett.

Other course offerings include astrology, tarot and the occult, basic bartending and cocktail hosting, libertarianism, camping and hiking, and ham radio.

Created in 1966, NFU tries to fill in the educational gaps left by the UNL course curriculum, Howlett said.

Howlett said he expects about 700 people to register for NFU this semester. The cost is $1 and permits students to take as many courses as he wishes.

Howlett said he is looking for people to teach courses and to submit course ideas. He said this semester's courses, workshops and seminars are grouped into 10 categories: academics, alternate lifestyles, arts and crafts, community activities, human potential series, literature, music, political action, economy and coping with modern life.

NFU is advertising off campus to recruit non-university participants.

Ads for NFU will be placed in Lincoln and Omaha newspapers, and on radio and television. Lincoln high schools, Union College and Nebraska Wesleyan University also will receive information about NFU.

NFU officials plan to contact college advisory boards to find out if students can get college credit for taking NFU courses, Howlett said.

Registration will be in dormitories, in the Nebraska Union and downtown from Feb. 11-15.

Persons with course ideas or those interested in teaching courses should contact either the NFU office (472-2534), Union 338, Howlett (475-1051), or co-chairperson Missy Critchfield (435-2961).
