MUN told economic disparity must end

Human beings—and countries—should be trusted to make the best decisions in their own and in the international interest. This point was made by Mladen Soic in his address at the Thursday afternoon opening session of UNL's seventh annual Model United Nations (MUN) Conference.

Soic, a Yugoslavian information official, said the main cause of war and destruction is ambition to conquer and control. He said one country does not have the right to tell another what kind of government it should have.

Peace is impossible if the status quo is maintained, Soic said. The gap between the developed and underdeveloped countries cannot continue. If the economic discrepancy isn't solved peacefully, it will be solved by fighting, he said.

"I believe in the United Nations because there is no alternative. We have to and shall change conditions," Soic said. It is necessary to go deeper into causes of the international situation, he said.

"We must take a chance to create conditions of peace, equality, no aggression and no interference for all," he said. Also speaking at the session were UN delegates Patrick Leclercq of France and Frank X.J.C. Njenga of Kenya.

Leclercq discussed the role France has played in the Arab-Israeli conflict in the Middle East.

Njenga, speaking on the policy of non-alignment and the Third World nations, explained the necessity for such nations to form a power block in order to protect and advance their common interests.

About 600 persons, most of whom are Nebraska high school and college students, are participating in the conference. Delegations, however, came from as far away as the Chicago Institute of Technology. The conference is one of the largest of its kind in the United States, according to Terry Mahlman, MUN secretary general.

Delegations of four or more persons are representing 90 countries in four committees: Political and Security; Special Political; Social, Humanitarian and Cultural, and Human Rights Ad Hoc.

Two other committees, the Economic and Social Council and the Security Council, also will meet before the conference ends on Saturday.

Possible issues to be discussed include the fate of the world refugees, the policy of Apartheid, the world food program and the possible involvement of the CIA and American big business in the recent overthrow of Chile's government.

Resolutions decided upon in committee meetings will be debated in the General Assembly, which convenes Friday at noon. They then will be voted on.

Resulting official recommendations will be sent to the United Nations in New York and to government agencies in Nebraska.

The MUN Conference "enables students to become aware of the world around them," said Mahlman. "It helps them develop a sense of anti-ethnocentrism."

MUN South Africa delegate Dave Thurber said the conference is an "outstanding forum for finding out what makes nations tick."

He said he is participating because of his overall educational interest and his specific interest in international affairs.
