College MEN and the Corps

The United States Marine Corps is continually looking to the nation's colleges and universities for a few good men with the potential to lead Marines.

Men selected for Marine officer programs attend pre-commission training either in summer sessions between academic years, or after college graduation.

There are two basic officer programs, Platoon Leaders Class (PLC) and Officer Candidate Class (OCC). In addition to ground officer preparation, each program has aviation options. Men qualified for training either as future pilots or flight officers are guaranteed post-commission aviation training before they enroll.

In terms of monetary incentives it is important to realize that the amount an officer is paid is based on length of service as well as rank. Your longevity is counted from the time you enter one of our college programs. Begin PLC in your freshman year, and you'll have a three year advantage over the senior enrolled in OCC. In dollars and cents that can mean over $1,850 in additional annual compensation after commissioning.

Another monetary plus is the financial assistance that selected PLC members can receive. You could get $100 each month of the school year in exchange for additional active duty obligations. This assistance may be payable for up to three years. That's a total of $2,700.

Challenge, leadership and responsibility await the few good men who will become Marine officers. The programs which can lead to this extraordinary life are outlined on the following pages.

Pilots & Flight Officers

Aviation Training

After Basic school, future Marine pilots and flight officers proceed directly to Pensacola, Florida and other aviation training centers to learn to fly supersonic jets and the latest jet powered helicopters. Pilot training lasts from thirteen to sixteen months. Flight officers—the vital electronics and radar specialists in some high-performance Marine jets—require eight months of schooling before joining a squadron.
