Giving samples is the worst part of the test, he added.

Between blood lettings, the 20 or more participants play cards, study or use the pool tables. Curfew is 1 a.m., he said.

The drugs Evensen said he has tested include lozenges for sore throats, Darvon (a pain killer) and diuretics, which increase the discharge of urine.

Evensen once was selected to undergo Phase I testing. He said he didn't have any side effects but one of the other subjects lost control of his muscles. His neck muscles tightened, and he couldn't talk.

Ron Harris would not comment on this case, saying that names and specifics of experiments are confidential. However, Harris repeated that subjects are informed of possible side effects if they are known.

"Anyone who needs the money should try the experiments," he said. Pay ranges from $10 for experiments not requiring a stay at the laboratory to $200 for a series of three weekend tests.

Miller also is participating in these studies, but it's the first time for him.

Miller said he is involved in a 3-weekend bioavailability study to test the effects of an antibiotic.

Doctors told the group of 21 that migraine headaches and upset stomachs could be side effects of the drug.

"I had a slight headache for about four hours, but I got used to it. It was nothing really severe," Miller said. Doctors treated subjects who suffered these symptoms, he said.

Money was one thing that enticed Miller to do the study, he said, but it was not the only reason. Another was to "have a good time" and be able to experience the study. It's also a good time to get studying done, he said.

Miller is being paid more than $300, an unusually high amount, he said.

Miller said he signed a statement saying he was at least 19 years old, but "you don't have to sign anything that released Harris Laboratories from liability in case of an accident."
