Sunrise...

Despite setbacks, the proposed radio station has gained support and money from the community, he said.

Sunrise encourages persons to subscribe to the radio station. Subscription cost is determined on a progressive rate by the individual's income. Sunrise Communications now has well over $3,000, Kurtenbach said.

Subscribers have input into how things will be done at the station, but "we've made no deals with anybody," he said. Sunrise has between 50 and 60 subscribers.

Sunrise also has received a tape recorder, access to record collections, free legal advice, a transmitter and an antenna from interested persons.

Overhead costs will be low since workers will be volunteers, he said.

Jeremy Lansman, a radio organizer in St. Louis, has greatly helped Sunrise in preparing their FCC application and setting up the station, Kurtenbach said.

Sunrise Communications workers currently are conducting a telephone survey of Lincoln residents to determine what kinds of radio broadcasts people listen to and when and why they listen.
