

Equal fines, fee for staff, faculty?

On the premise that all UNL students, faculty and staff should be fined and treated equally, the Council on Student Life's (CSL) Ad Hoc Fees and Fines Committee took a stab at existing discrepancies in those policies.

Michael Steinman, committee chairman and political science assistant professor, presented the report to CSL Thursday after the committee conducted a series of public hearings with representatives of UNL departments which levy fees or fines.

Noting that its recommendations were "shaped on the ideal (rather) than by considerations of hard reality," the committee called for equalizing fees, fines and appellate procedures for all members of the UNL community.

Some of those recommendations include:

-Equalizing the procedures for the time allowed in checking out library materials, renewal of library materials, and fines for late returns for faculty, graduate and undergraduate students. Now faculty and graduate students can check out some library materials for two months as compared with two weeks for undergraduates. Also faculty as students in courses are not fined for some late materials. Fines for graduates and undergraduates are started within the second day after materials are due.

-Allowing open access during parking permit registration to all UNL parking lots. No special consideration would be given to any UNL member except to the handicapped. Now faculty and staff have specially designated parking lots usually closer to the center of campus than students' parking lots.

-Establishing a system of appeals boards for final decisions about disputes over fees and fines. Most final decisions currently are decided within the department levying the fee or fine.

-Imposing some type of penalty on faculty or staff who leave fees or fines unpaid, thus, making penalties equitable with penalties levied on students. Holding faculty or staff member's paychecks was suggested. No strict sanction is imposed on those two groups for leaving fees or fines unpaid while students may have registration or a degree withheld if they do not take care of all bills.

CSL tabled the report until next week.

CSL also heard from its Registration Task Force. Roy Arnold, task force chairman, presented a report on the task force's actions. Arnold is an associate professor and chairman of the Food Science and Technology Department.
