Stigma attached to mentally ill

However, he said at that time, he was still fighting the battle, and an investigator was sent to Lincoln to determine his fitness to handle a gun. Matthews said that the investigator questioned both his psychiatrist and his old USDA employer. Both, he said, told him the investigator seemed preconvinced to find him mentally and emotionally unfit to handle a gun. Both told him, he said, that the investigator asked leading questions about any strange behavior he might have had.

Different Job

Matthews after appealing his firing, was hired by the post office, where he remains today.

He said that taking the post office job jeopardized his legal suit against the government, because he suffered little monetary damage. Continuing the suit, he said, would no longer benefit him, although it might be of help to others.

Although his case is still with NCLU, because he found another job, his case is no longer strong, even though he was fired discriminately.

He said that due to the stigma of having been mentally ill, "I received the same type of treatment as Eagleton did." (Eagleton was ousted from his position as vice presidential nominee under George McGovern, when it was revealed he had had shock treatments.)

Gail Lockard, social worker at the Lincoln Lancaster Mental Health Clinic, said that if a patient is turned away from a job because of past mental history his legal rights probably are being violated.

System Frightening

"But the big system scares many patients so they don't often fight court battles," she said.

"Or they react to discrimination feeling everyone is that way, and they give up and refuse to look for other employment.

"Sometimes they've been so beaten down that they just don't feel like fighting," she said.

Take heart, Joanie-Caucus, you're not alone.

Although few are runaway housewives like the "Doonesbury" comic strip character who lives in a commune, awaiting acceptance from law school, many women are, like Ms. Caucus, returning to college after long absences.

They return for a variety of reasons. Some want to finish degrees. Some have time on their hands, with the young ones having flown from the nest. Some come for the enrichment. Some never before had the chance to attend.

But with larger campuses, longer registration lines, and classmates the age of their children, many women are bound to become discouraged with school, like Ms. Caucus who can't find a college that will accept her as a student.

At UN-L, the Nebraska Alumni Association is helping women "get over the scares of coming back to school," according to Carol Reno, director of alumni relations.

The Association sponsored Saturday a back-to-school workshop for women returning to finish college at UN-L. Ms. Reno, the workshop's coordinator, said its two-fold purpose was to identify campus resources for women, and to establish for them a peer group where they can meet and discuss their common problems. According to a pre-workshop estimate by Ms. Reno, 65 women were expected to
