

Ford giving equipment

The Ford Motor Company is assisting mechanical engineering students at the University of Nebraska-Lincoln in their study of the internal combustion engine by supplying equipment for laboratory use.

Recently D. A.R. Peters, associate professor in the College of Engineering and Technology, and Guy Dean, a Lincoln Ford dealer who is chairman of Ford's community affairs committee, unpacked a gift of components and training aids valued at $3,500.

These parts included starting systems, carburation and fuel systems, and ignition systems. These components, along with a 170 CID 6-cylinder Ford engine which was a gift from Ford in 1972, are being used in mechanical engineering's Theory of Combustion and Senior Laboratory courses.

Dean helped arrange the donations through Ford's Advancement of Technical Training Program.

Students donate time

students campaigning for Congressman Charles Thone's reelection will serve on councils formed at schools throughout the district, according to Dave Stevens, youth director for Thone's campaign. Stevens said the councils have a two-fold purpose, to advise Thone on issues of concern to youth, and to tie students into the party.

Both the Dyas and Thone campaigns recruit UN-L students from on-campus, party-affiliated groups, according to the campaign managers.

Recent reorganization of the UN-L Young Republicans, where Stevens said most of the campus support for Thone lies, made it impossible to approximate how many UN-L students are with the Thone campaign.

Some students, like Mullen, are walk-ins. Through a UN-L Young Democrats meeting, Mullen said, he became acquainted with the Dyas campaign and discovered he shared the same views as Dyas did.

"I was tired of hearing the same old thing from Nebraska Republicans," he said, and so joined the Dyas staff.

Students who become involved in campaigns of members of either political party generally are politically inclined to begin with, according to campaign managers on both sides.

Steve Tupper, campaign coordinator for State Senator Richard Marvel's gubernatorial bid, said many of his student workers are from Nebraska Wesleyan, where Marvel had been a political science instructor. Those with a political science background "have got some idea of what's going on and can test the theories they've learned in class by working in a campaign," Tupper said.

The value of having students as campaign workers is that they lend "an issue-kind of input" to a campaign said Kurtenbach. "Students are more liberal and are concerned about the issues as well as the candidate," he said.

However, the three campaign managers agreed that student participation in campaigns has decreased over the past years.

"It's hard for anyone to get excited about a campaign at this point," said Kurtenbach. "But it wasn't too long ago that students were interested in politics no matter what time of year it was. I don't know what caused it. Probably the war or the draft."

Volunteers combat selfishness

A junior majoring in social work at the University of Nebraska-Lincoln, Steve Porter says college encourages students to be selfish.

He said that one way to combat that selfishness is through the Student Volunteer Service (SVS). Through this service, he has been a Y-Pal and group organizer for six months.

SVS coordinator Mary Dean said that through this program students are referred to community service projects and to individuals needing aid. Interested students may then choose the area they would most like to working.

Besides Y-Pals, students are referred to such programs as the University Day Care Center, Lincoln-Lancaster Mental Health Center, Lincoln-Lancaster Mental Retardation Center, public schools, Neighborhood Youth Corps, 4-H, and the Youth Service Bureau.

Students have also been referred to services such as reading to the blind, tutoring Indian children through TONIC and conducting book drives for the Nebraska penal complex library.

Porter noted that many people feel volunteer work is too hard and they are afraid they would be ineffective.

In Y-Pals, he said he worked with a 10-year-old boy who had been in trouble because of his long hair. He said his work with Robby was effective, but many children in this program are not really in need of help. Their parents are just looking for glorified babysitters, he said.

In the Y-Pal program student volunteers are matched with children from one-parent homes and troubled school careers.

Dean noted that the volunteer project is more successful for the student if the assignment is clearly defined and tightly structured. Too often the organization seeking volunteers fails to tell the student what is expected of him or how he is doing.

"When the student is unclear about his responsibilities," she said, "he loses interest and drops out."

The SVS has been in existence about four years. Any organization needing help can ask for volunteers, she said. Students wishing to volunteer can contact Mary Dean at the Student Services center in the student union.
