

Library tours help new students

Librarians at Love Library don't want to scare undergraduates away, Kathy Johnson, assistant Librarian in social studies and humanities, said.

To prove the point, they are conducting daily tours for new students. Tours begin at 10 a.m. and 2 p.m. at the main desk on the first floor of Library. The ten-minute tours will be conducted through Sept. 6.

New students may have trouble finding books they need, and get discouraged, Johnson said.

"We want to show the new student where he can go to get help," she said.

The tours are for transfer students as well as freshmen, she said.

English teachers who teach freshmen classes have their classes taken on tours of the undergraduate library in Nebraska Hall.

Response to the short tours, however, has been "spotty," Johnson said. Tours average one or two students a day, but some days no one takes them, according to Rita Hug, head of the order department and a tour guide. She said she did not know exactly how many students have taken the tour so far this year.

Hug said she thought response to the tours is poor because the posters advertising them are up only in the library. Many students probably have not seen the signs, she said.

One freshman who took a tour said she thought it was worthwhile, but it only began to explain how to find a book in Love Library.

Johnson said the tours are conducted to show the new student where to get help, not to show him how to find a book. The tours include the three main floors and the "stacks" at Love.
