UNL students tutor 100 Indian children

About 100 Indian children were on the UNL campus Tuesday night to be tutored by university students.

The organization bringing the children and university students together, Tutors of Nebraska Indian children (TONIC) operates with the Winnebago Reservation.

Twenty-five to 30 tutors travel to Winnebago once a week to meet with about 60 children, and 85 tutors work on the UNL campus, the children range in school grades from kindergarten to eleventh.

Co-coordinator Suzy Prenger said TONIC is not a liberal do-gooder organization, but "we try to fill the academic and social needs of the children."

However, she added, tutors benefit from the teaching experience and have a chance to instruct on a one-to-one basis with the children.

"Our most important concern is getting tutors committed to the cause," Prenger said. "If a tutor does not show up then the children think that person has quit on them."

According to Prenger, the children are not forced to attend weekly sessions, but success is measured by attendance. One goal of the tutors is to instill confidence and trust, she said.

"A basic problem is that they need to learn how to read and write," Prenger commented, "and learning may not be the most fun thing for them right now, but it is most helpful."

Tutors keep in contact with the child's teacher to stay informed on his progress, she said.

Prenger said TONIC has offered to tutor the children at the Wounded Knee Barracks. It is not known if the school-aged children there will remain at the barracks for a full school term, she said.

Recruitment for TONIC and the independent study courses that accompany it is continuing, she said.
