'Nation Man' involves himself

By John Kalkowski

"Our grandfathers tell us that the trouble with the white people is that they are eating their own grandchildren," said Tom Cook, a Mohawk Indian who visited Centennial College Tuesday. "We are here to make sure they are not going to eat our grandchildren in the process."

Cook, whose Indian name is Kanakaniate, is the associate editor of an Indian newspaper, Akwesasne Notes.

He identified himself as a "Nation Man", who involves himself in the activities of his nation.

In May, Cook was sentenced to two years probation by the U.S. District Court on charges of draft evasion.

On Sept. 10, Cook appeared in the U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals claiming that his refusal to be inducted into the armed forces was based on the sovereignty of the Mohawk Nation as well as the fact that he is a member and resident of the Canadian-side Mohawks.

The Mohawk reservation on which Cook lives spans the border between the United States and Canada.

According to Cook, the three appeals judges would not deal with the sovereignty issue but instead concerned themselves with technicalities of the case.

Cook said the American Indians are concerned with developments that seem to be bringing death to the native American environment.

"The future well-being of the American Indian is related to the fight we can make against these developments," he said.

The recent trails of American Indian Movement (AIM) leaders are related to the pattern of injustice concerning the freedom of North American Indians, Cook said.

"It is unfortunate that the government of the United States people would pursue an obvious course of harassment of national Indian leadership," he said.

According to Cook, the first time a group of white people listened to the entire Indian story was at the Wounded Knee trials of Russell Means and Dennis Banks.

He explained that American citizens were finally in a position to make judgments on the Indian treaties and the Indian people.

"The American government is scared to death of letting the American people make a determination of United States treatment of Indian people," he said.

Cook, besides being associate editor of the Akwesasne Notes, is the president of the American Indian Press Assoc.
