Indian problems subtle-counselor

UNL's new American Indian counselor said he had to go to college before he finally found persons who treated him for who he is, not for what he is.

Gordon Kitto, who replaced Karen Buller as the American Indian counselor at the Minority Affairs Office, said the problems he faced as an Indian have been very subtle, such as not being invited to parties as a youngster because he was an Indian, Kitto said. Even in high school, Indian students stayed in Indian groups, he said.

"Members of dominant white society are in the mainstream of life so they do not have to meet all the obstacles minority members must face," Kitto said.

White society members have some tools to cope with their problems, he said.

"The minority students might have the same tools, but after being put down by society for so long, they are afraid to use them."

Effective program

The UNL Minority Affairs program is effective according to Kitto. The counselors in the program have insights they can share with the minority students because they are in the same ethnic group, he said.

Kitto said he can best help the Indian student by "just being an Indian and just being a person."

Although he has been accepted as a counselor, Kitto said, the interaction between Indian students and himself have been limited because of the Indian student boycott of the minorities affairs office.

The boycott was sparked by the resignation of American Indian counselor Karen Buller in late May.

Most of the problems Kitto said he has dealt with as a counselor have been financial aid and academic problems.

Barrier for students

Kitto said there is a barrier between himself and Indian students. He sees the barrier as "a culmination of many problems the University has had since hiring a counselor for Indian students."

"When I talk to students or counsel them, it doesn't necessarily take place in four walls, but wherever the situation arises," said Kitto. "My counseling isn't limited to an 8 a.m. to 5 p.m. day, five days a week. It's a 24-hour-a-day, seven-day-a-week job."

Kitto has two bachelor degrees, a master's degree and is currently working on a Ph.D. in educational administration.

Fee Board to discuss bylaws

The Fee Allocations Board will discuss and make more specific the criterion and bylaws of the board, as defined by last year's board, at their meeting at 5 p.m. Thursday in the Nebraska Union, according to board members.

Business at the last Thursday's meeting included the election of Marguerite Boslaugh as chairman of the board and Gary Martin as secretary.

At that meeting, the board decided to hire a recording secretary to work from three to five hours a week doing the board's paperwork.

Boslaugh said she hopes the board can spend much of its time during the first semester researching projects. She said she also hopes the board meetings will become more open to the student body through better publication of fee requests and meeting agendas.

The board is also considering publishing an informational pamphlet sometime in the future to tell students how much of their student fee money is allocated to whom, and to outline the board's duties and responsibilities.

The first formal business on the year's agenda, Boslaugh said, will be at the Oct. 24 meeting when representatives of the Engineers Executive Board will request more fees for its projects.
