Status of policewomen discussed

By Paula Damke
 The question of the status of Omaha policewomen will again go before the Omaha City Council Tuesday.

Similar action in Feb. 1974 by the Lincoln City Council resulted in adoption of single job classification of police officers but did not change the duties of the policewomen or patrolmen.

Omaha Mayor Ed Zorinsky vetoed an ordinance passed Nov. 5 by the Omaha City Council adopting a single job classification for policewomen and patrolmen making them police officers with the same duties.

Veto

Zorinsky vetoed the ordinance because of an added amendment giving the 12 Omaha female officers a year to decide whether to assume the new job classification and added duties or resign.

The five Lincoln women police officers' duties are with women prisoners, juveniles, rape victims and domestic crises. They are not assigned cruiser duty.

Ricki Salzberry, of the Omaha mayor's commission on the status of women, said the added duties meant some women for the first time in Omaha would work patrol cruiser duty.

Salzberry said 11 of 12 policewomen had objected to cruiser duty saying they weren't hired to do that job.

Criminal division assignment

Joy Wemmer, one of the Lincoln female officers said, a woman officer in Lincoln is assigned to the criminal division rather than the traffic division.

She said everyone starts as an officer and there is ample opportunity of promotion for a woman. She added women are paid on the same pay scale as men officers.

She said she personally would not want to be retrained for cruiser duty. "I was hired to work with females and I enjoy what I'm doing," she said.

Linda Steinman, another officer, said there is a need for the work women police officers do.

'Should be an option

Steinman, who has a degree in fine arts, said she thinks it should be an option for women officers to either be retrained for cruiser duty or remain in the position they have.

Catherine Riggle, woman police officer said she thought women should be as fully trained as men, but there are some jobs women are more suited for (working with rape victims, etc.).

She said she felt the option of being retrained or remaining in their present position should be made after the first (rookie) year.

Police officer Catherine Riggle says some police jobs are more suited for women.

"Nothing replaces experience and after the rookie year, the officer is in a better position to know what's right," Riggle said.

Lincoln City Councilman Max Denny commenting on the Omaha situation, said he agreed with the single job classification, but he thinks it should be the option of the present policewomen to decide whether to be retrained or stay in the position they have.

Include option

Sue Bailey, council member, said she thought the sensible action would include the option.

She said women officers shouldn't be forced to resign just because they didn't want to work cruiser duty.

Bob Sitiya, council member, said he did not feel a woman should be put in a job, such as cruiser duty, that she was not capable of or one that would put her life in jeopardy.

Lincoln Mayor Sam Schwartzkopf said without the complete facts of the Omaha situation he could not make a statement on the matter.

Outstanding officers

But Schwartzkopf said the Lincoln women police officers are outstanding in their jobs and a credit to the department.

Salzberry said the Omaha ordinance prior to the amendment would put the city in conformance with equal employment laws.

She said the original ordinance (single job classification) was supported by the mayor, the male police officers and the mayor's commission on the status of women.
